Ruddy Duck Slaughter Cancelled

The Department of the Environment has cancelled its plans for a mass slaughter of ruddy ducks in the UK following protests by Animal Aid across the country over the Easter weekend. As reported in the group's 'Outrage' magazine, the ruddy duck's alleged crime was to have flown over to Spain from this country and mated with the endangered white-headed duck (a closely-related stiff-tail). The resulting hybrid was viewed as 'impure' by some conservation groups and they pressed for the ruddys to be culled, determined to conserve the 'racially pure' white-headed duck.

A 'Ruddy Duck Working Group' was set up in the UK, consisting chiefly of representatives from the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust (WWT), the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Department of the Environment. Trial shootings of ruddys took place, with some birds dying in prolonged agony. One took 2 hours to die. Another was shot 13 times and was still alive when picked up from the water.

Animal Aid's highly publicised demonstration outside the RSPB's AGM in October 1996 helped raise public awareness about the planned cull and Animal Aid decided to follow the protests outside each of the 8 Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust Centres over the Easter weekend. Both organisations actively supported a further trial cull of ruddy ducks this Spring and AA needed the help of their members to get the slaughter stopped. The Group distributed thousands of leaflets to Trust visitors explaining the campaign and urged them to support Animal Aid by raising the issue during their visit. The protests attracted considerable media attention and triggered a series of regional radio and TV debates.

Animal Aid's position was quite clear: that they support the valuable efforts of conservation charities who work to preserve species' habitats and to raise public awareness about wildlife, but that when certain groups begin to advocate the killing of one species in order to conserve another, Animal Aid will do everything they can to stop them. Animal Aid are convinced that the level of public opposition to the cull gave the DoE the final push it needed. A couple of days after the WWT protests, the DoE advised Animal Aid that it 'currently' has 'no plans for a trial cull'. And an official spokesperson for English Nature - who have been advising the government on the issue and had serious reservations about the killings - told AA, "It's off indefinitely as far as we are concerned. We are very pleased that the Government has taken our advice... the Government does not wish it to take place so it will not take place." Animal Aid will continue campaigning to ensure that this decision is a permanent one.

Please write to the Department of the Environment, European Wildlife Division, Room 902E, Tollgate House, Houlton Street, Bristol BS2 9DJ to congratulate them on their decision to cancel the ruddy duck cull and to ask them to ensure that the cull will not be resumed at a later date.

London Animal Action News

Fur Trade

LAA is the largest independent local animal rights group in London. They have continued to be very active since the last issue with a number of ongoing campaigns. Fur Free London remains the focus for regular activity, with pickets of London's remaining fur shops on a weekly basis and home visits to fur shop directors. They have also been investigating mink farms all over the country and were involved in setting up a UK branch of the international Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade (CAFT).

Vivisection Industry

Increased action against the vivisection industry nationwide has led to the launch of London Anti-Vivisection Action (LAVA), set up in May 1997 to encourage protest against vivisection in London.

Events so far have included home visits to vivisectors and company directors of Huntingdon Life Sciences. Future activity includes a national demonstration against BIBRA International, a contract research and testing laboratory, on August 30th. London activists have also supported other campaigns around the country such as those at Consort Beagles (now closed) and Hill Grove Cat Breeders and Huntingdon Research Centre. LAA held an eventful demonstration around Central London at vivisection abuse establishments on World Day for Laboratory Animals. Other anti-vivisection activity has included demos at cancer research shops and headquarters, and pickets of Unilever and Glaxo Wellcome AGM's held in London.

Hunt Sabbing

Many individuals in LAA are active hunt saboteurs who encourage closer links between animal rights and London's several hunt sab groups. At the recent pro-hunt march on July 10th 1997, LAA held a picket at the offices of the BFSS in south London. They were involved in various other activities during the day such as picketing Downing Street and protesting at angling/shooting shops.

The flagship John Lewis department store on Oxford Street has been leafleted every Saturday afternoon informing the public of their involvement in bloodsports. This is in support of the National Anti Hunting Campaign in their fight to close down John Lewis' shooting estate in Hampshire, where their top executives go on weekend killing sprees.

Live Exports

Other individuals in the group dedicate much of their time to supporting the live export protests at the MAFF offices in London and at Dover port. LAA members also attended demos at the farms of Peter and Gordon Gilder, two of the main live export hauliers.

McDonald's

LAA has always had close links with the McLibel Support Campaign and have been active picketing stores and distributing leaflets against McDonald's. Following the verdict of the libel trial LAA had a victory Day of Action targeting the West End stores.

Office/Stalls

LAA have had their own office since Jan. '97 which is staffed on a daily basis by volunteers. The group hold regular stalls around London which educate the public and encourage people to get actively involved in the struggle for animal liberation. LAA produce the increasingly popular London Animal Rights News (LARN) with a growing international readership! They hold an open meeting on the second Tuesday of the month at the 1a Community Centre, 1a Rosebery Avenue, London EC1. Subscription to LARN costs £5 per year (conc. £3).

Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade

According to the latest Government figures there are now only ten mink fur farms licensed in Britain. This means that over the past year two mink farms have closed. Please let CAFT know if you have any information at all relating to fur farms. The Labour Party have stated in their animal welfare leaflet that they 'stand for an end to fur farming', and correspondence with Elliot Morley (previously Labour's Animal Welfare Spokesperson and now a junior agriculture minister) has revealed that the new Government will not issue fur licences under the Mink Keeping Order. Without this licence mink farms cannot legally operate. According to the 'Mink (Keeping) Regulations' licences are granted for a period not exceeding 12 months. If Labour stick to their word then, fingers crossed, the few remaining mink farms should be closing. Contact CAFT for any developments. Unfortunately the Labour Party do not intend to ban all fur farming, believing that if they did they 'would face a legal challenge and end up paying compensation'. This means that fox and chinchilla farming can continue (although there are currently no fox farms left in Britain, they could start again unless the law is changed). There are no licences required for farming any animal other than mink for their fur, and CAFT will be campaigning to have ALL fur farming banned. The Mink (Keeping) Order should come up again for renewal in January 1998 and we will be ensuring that the Government issues a Prohibition Order to prohibit the keeping of mink altogether.

Some disturbing news has just reached CAFT (June) that the Council of Europe (CoE) is discussing new laws that will make things even worse for animals reared for their fur. The CoE's Standing Committee of the European Convention on the Protection of Animals Kept for Farming Purposes is trying to set up international standards for the 'basic needs' of fur farmed animals. In reality this will endorse fur farming, and under draft guidelines mink will be confined to wire cages measuring 30cm by 70cm - the floor-space equivalent to about 2 shoe-boxes. Arctic foxes will be confined to cages with less than a square metre of floor space. This is probably not much different to present conditions but allows fur farmers to claim that these horrific conditions are 'approved'. June's edition of the BBC Wildlife magazine, who have seen the leaked discussion documents, states that if the Committee agrees to the guidelines becoming law 'they will have to be implemented by member states (the CoE is composed of representatives from 40 European nations) and there will be little chance of amending them in the future, since a proposal for such an amendment can be blocked by the vote of just one member'. 'Democracy' in action yet again. Not surprisingly the British Fur Trade Association welcomes the proposals; showing great stupidity and great ignorance about the semi-aquatic mink a BFTA spokesperson said that providing enriched environments was 'not practical' because 'if mink have access to swimming water they would get wet and probably get cold and die'. We don't want bigger cages and 'enriched environments', we want empty cages and free animals!

It is still possible for member countries to block an agreement of fur farm 'standards' and if this happens the proposals will be shelved. Please write an urgent letter to Dr. Jack Cunningham at the Ministry of Agriculture requesting that the UK does not agree to the guidelines (point out Labour's opposition to fur farming) MAFF, Whitehall Place, London SW1A 2HH.

Barbaric Bar-B-Q Abandoned

A self-styled 'King of the Gypsies' was organising a hedgehog bar-b-q event in Uttroter, where hedgehogs marinated in honey and stuffed with shrimps were to be served to in excess of 500 people.

Adrian Coles, Chief Executive of the British Hedgehog Preservation Society, which has a membership of nearly 11,000 said, "I am pleased that common sense prevailed and this 'gimmick' has been cancelled."

St. Petersburg Society for the Protection of Stray Animals by Hilary Zendjebil (Chairwoman of Bognor and Chichester Action for Animals)

In June 1997 I spent a few days in St. Petersburg, visiting a friend who was studying Russian at the University. I had taken with me my 'Animals Contacts Directory' and on the last day of my stay I made an appointment to visit the St. Petersburg Society for the Protection of Animals, the only charity in Russia with shelters for sick and stray animals. I had already seen large numbers of street animals in the city and had wondered if any of them would survive the freezing winter.

I was met outside the clinic by Nina Shustrova, the vice-chairperson of the Society. She had kindly brought with her a young student to translate for me and she introduced me to a number of adopted cats who all ran towards her. She explained that the Society was founded in 1990 to provide a veterinary clinic for those who could not afford to pay and to set up a rescue/re-homing centre for stray dogs and cats.

They had started out with very little, a damp basement with no running water, no equipment and no toilet and as I was shown around I was struck by the tremendous dedication it must have taken to have established the clinic. In a different building outside the city they have also built a large home for dogs and cats. A little shop in the waiting area sold dog and cat food, worming tablets and flea powder and this helps to finance the clinic. In the treatment room I was shown an operating table and surgical equipment. We next went through into a tiny staff room where we had a long discussion about the many difficulties that the Society faces.

Many people in Russia are very poor indeed at the moment and membership of the Society had fallen from 600 to 400 in the last year - this hardship was brought home to me when I learned that annual membership only costs about 50p. The cost of medicines is huge, especially those to put animals to sleep. Nina had tried to get money from municipal sources but so far this has failed. The bureaucracy involved in applying for help in Russia is very daunting.

Some funding from abroad had recently been withdrawn and Nina was very worried about how they could possibly manage to keep the clinic and shelter open. She would be in favour of setting up a neutering programme if the money was available. Originally they had hoped that their Society's projects would be copied in other parts of Russia and Nina was disappointed that, so far, this had not happened.

As I left we promised to write to each other. I felt that it would be terribly sad if this organisation, giving a glimmer of hope to animals in Russia, were to fail now because of a lack of money.

If you would like to send a donation, however small, to help the St. Petersburg Society for the Protection of Stray Animals, please send it to:

A few words about Arkangel Magazine...

Arkangel is completely independent of any other organisation. Our aims are to further the cause of animal liberation by providing:

- useful information to those involved in the animal liberation movement,
- a resource for other readers, such as school students,
- a forum for debate on animal liberation issues.

We rely for the content on contributions from readers in the form of reports, letters, artwork and articles - without which there would be no magazine.

Just before each new issue we worry about whether we can afford to get it printed. The income from sales of one issue do not cover the cost of the next! We rely entirely on donations to make up the difference. The more money we have, the more magazines we can afford to print.

So, please send reports, articles and artwork, and if you've got any money left after helping out the good causes mentioned in this issue - please send us that too! Thanks.

News from the ALF Press Office

by Robin Webb

Hungry for change - starved of publicity

Most of my report for the previous edition of Arkangel was based around the massive upsurge of activity sparked by Barry Horne's courageous hunger strike; it also made clear the conspiracy to keep animal liberation out of the newspapers, off the TV screens and silenced from the radio waves.

Since that time so many determined demonstrations have taken place which have seen police lines breached, fencing torn down and animals rescued - not to mention the desperate use of CS gas by out-of-control riot police - that it would be difficult to list them all. The most notable victory must surely be the announcement that beagle-breeders Consort Kennels were to close. A clear result of constant picketing, angry invasions and ALF raids. Hy-Line Rabbits... Consort Kennels... next, please!

Also, since that time Geoff Sheppard, serving 7 years in HMP Parkhurst for wanting animal liberation, made a personal stand against vivisection by undertaking, in his own words, a '3-week fast' from Monday 5th May. Geoff, who had given strong practical support to Barry Horne earlier this year, wanted to set a firm date from the beginning to show he would do what he set out to achieve but later agreed that it could have been more accurately described as a '21-day hunger strike'. It was no surprise when the media coverage was virtually non-existent... those in power are just terrified of selfless commitment in pursuit of a better world.

The firm resolve of those in prison is being further inspired by the sustained mood of passionate determination at demos and rallies during recent months. The sacrifices of those like Geoff and Barry will continue to spur all of us on to even greater efforts. It's an ever-strengthening circle of mutual support. Cheers Geoff, cheers Barry, you're a real shot in the arm!

The Press Office in prison - again!

One of the more unusual talks the press office has undertaken occurred recently when I was invited to a double session (all morning) with the environmental group inside a prison that has to remain anonymous. The session began with a showing of 'Animal Liberation - The Movie' then continued through the various arguments and areas of animal abuse into an extended discussion period. It was comforting to know that I was going to be let out again the same day but still felt pretty strange to have doors unlocked for me as I went through each one.

Written reaction from the prisoners which was forwarded to me later was quite enlightening. To quote from just a few: "Some of the information was shocking and left a sour taste in the mouth, especially in areas of animal testing" ... "I would be more inclined to break some legs" ... "the ALF should become more involved with Justice Department and other more paramilitary organisations and really take the fight into the homes of those involved" ... "Try not to be as radical as the ARM and JD as that would lead to the ALF's downfall eventually" ... "the companies that sponsor and run these labs should be financially ruined, their insurance policies need scrutinizing so the maximum amount of damage can be done to them" ... "to see how they killed the pig as they did (in the video) sent a great shock through me" and a final example ... "I think you should do whatever you want because to be honest I am not really that concerned". Oh well, you can't win 'em all!

Got shot of another trial

After nearly 3 years the shotgun lunacy reached its conclusion but with a virtual whimper rather than the expected big bang (-up)! The first day opened with Dave Hammond's barrister presenting his skeleton argument which included a demand that the informant's identity be disclosed, during which three possible candidates were named. My barrister then outlined a claimed conspiracy by various police forces to convict me of something - anything - and requested disclosure of the security forces and secret services roles including the agency responsible for placing the admitted tracking device on my vehicle. He also supported the submission from Dave's barrister whilst adding a fourth name to the list of possible informants.

From that time on the prosecution were asking for adjournments; seeking further advice from the CPS, discussing matters with the judge in chambers (in private) and generally getting worried about what they may be ordered to disclose. During the second afternoon the judge made it clear that the reasons for such delays were 'new submissions' put forward by my barrister.

Came the third day and - Lo! - the prosecution wished to offer no evidence and invited the judge to return 'not guilty' verdicts. So, we still don't know the involvement of the security forces and MI5 and - like the Reading 3 trial - still don't know the identity of the informant. All we do know is that it's over at last. Costs? Compensation? You must be joking!

New Labour - new hope?

New Labour made many promises leading up to the last general election, a number of which related to animal abuse. Let's take some time out and look at the promises, given in writing, then compare them with what has actually been done. Please bear in mind Tony Blair's words speaking in the House of Commons on 2nd July 1997: "When we make promises we will keep them".

Firstly, on animal experimentation New Labour were 'proposing a Royal Commission to investigate the claims that animals need to be used and to recommend on alternatives' and wanted to 'see an end to ... tests like the LD50 and the use of animals in any experiment related to tobacco, alcohol and weapons development'. By the 10th July 1997 Lord William of Mostyn, who has Ministerial responsibility for the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, wrote that he does 'not believe that a Royal Commission is necessary at this time'.

More fine words came about bloodsports with New Labour being 'committed to an immediate suspension of licences to hunting with hounds on Forestry Commission and Ministry of Defence Land'. This promise resulted in a temporary suspension of licences outside the hunting season while an internal review is carried out. New Labour won't even reveal who is carrying out the review!

New Labour then committed itself to a free vote on whether to ban hunting with hounds. If such a vote was successful they would 'ensure a bill to ban these activities would have the necessary parliamentary time' and that there would 'be no compromise with the Lords on this issue'. Tony Blair has said that he will vote for the bill but so far his Government has refused to confirm that time will be made available. This follows persistent reports that New Labour whips put tremendous pressure on Mike Foster MP not to put forward the private members bill.

If we don't win the anti-hunting bill this time it will be lost for ten or twenty years, perhaps even longer. It must not be lost. If you have a Labour MP write asking them to meet the promise that time would be made available. Also write to Tony Blair whether or not your constituency MP is Labour. Organise pickets and demonstrations outside your local Labour Party offices but make sure you let the local news media know it's happening. Demonstrations outside Labour MPs' homes or presenting them with local petitions is another possibility. ALF actions and hunt sabotage can stop some hunts and some blood junkies and save some individual animals' lives but only parliamentary legislation, properly enforced, can stop hunting per se. We may not like the system, but that's the real world and we owe it to our brothers and sisters of other species to do whatever is necessary to make sure that this time we win. We must not allow this bill to fail, the animals out there have waited far too long already. Don't just ask Tony Blair to keep his promises, DEMAND that he does so. DEMAND that he shows his Government is free from sleaze and two-faced political opportunism. DEMAND that he proves that New Labour still has a little bit of compassion as an ingredient. A broken promise to us just means frustration. To a fox, hare, deer or mink it's a matter of life or death.

What have they been up to again?

Most of you will be aware that, although I am a member of the NUJ, to attempt anything like a full list of ALF and similar actions would be considered grounds for, yet again, charging me with incitement! That said, up and down the country windows are being removed to improve ventilation during the hot weather, locks are being glued to aid security and animals are being taken to new homes so that feeding costs are more evenly distributed. Oh dear, that last bit sounds a bit more like Old Labour than New Labour ... sorry, Tony!

During mid-April, around the time the previous Arkangel was being printed, the Institute of Animal Technicians held its 3-day annual conference at Exeter University. Not only were the delegates greeted by an angry, vociferous group of protesters, more than 30 windows at the Hatherley biological science laboratories and other places at the University were smashed. Inspector Hierons of Exeter police said, "We are linking this incident to the protesters" and added, no doubt with a glazed expression, "Who else would want to damage laboratory windows?"

Live exports and 'livestock' haulage were hit a couple of weeks later when Spiers Haulage in Claverdon, near Warwick, was attacked with incendiary devices. One tractor unit was completely destroyed with others damaged; The cost of this devastation was around £30,000. Near that time envelopes containing razor blades were sent to a number of Tory election candidates in attacks which appeared to be bloodsports-related.

The infamous Hillgrove Farm cat breeding establishment was also attacked during the same period, this time Farmer Brown's Range Rover was destroyed with further damage to parts of the farmhouse totalling in excess of £30,000. Of course, Hillgrove Farm continues to be subject to angry demonstrations, raids and mysterious damage. The unfortunate holidaymakers at Hillgrove's rented cottage have complained to the English Tourist Board having said that: "We didn't know what we were walking into!"

Into May and butchers shops were still being hit almost nightly up and down the country. One example was the Dorset Meat Company store in Dorchester which opened for the first time having been fitted out at a cost of tens of thousands of pounds. The only thing missing was the £1,300 front window. The distraught butcher complained that he 'was just about to put the shutters on when this happened'... Also in May the ALF rescued at least 15 beagles from the now-closed Consort Kennels, adding to the ten puppies liberated earlier this year. Beagles lead us neatly into the report that Spreo Pets pet shop in Isleworth, Greater London, was painted with graffiti and sent a letter warning that etching fluid attacks may be next. The letter demanded that the shop stop selling 'pets' because they 'don't give a damn as to where the animals end up'.

During June in Alton, Hampshire, the High Street was closed when an area outside Boots the Chemist was sealed off while firefighters wearing chemical protection suits dealt with an 'unidentified substance' covering a door into the store in an alcove between Boots and a butcher's shop. Five members of Boots staff were taken to Alton Health Centre suffering the effects of the fumes, the Hampshire police (you must remember the Hampshire Loonies from my trials and tribulations!) declared a major incident alert because of 'the possibility of Animal Liberation Front activity' and called the Scenes of Crime Officer to 'analyse the chemical and evaluate the danger'. The highly dangerous blue liquid chemical was finally identified as ... toilet cleaner. It could surely only happen to the Hampshire Loonies, even I couldn't make that one up! Many thanks to Det. Supt. Desmond Thomas's trusty band of silly plods for yet more amusement in these dark times...

And finally... just in case the last example was all Greek to you then here's the news that in June the McDonald's in Athens was warned that a hoax bomb had been placed. Not only MuckD's but the entire surrounding area was cleared for some time... statistics are not yet available to show whether there has been a short-term improvement in human health due to the closure!

In closing...

As I write this the National Anti-Hunt Campaign's march and rally is less than a week away. Don't worry about the reported numbers of sadistic halfwits in Hyde Park, that cost the hunts a fortune to bus them in, was claimed as being in support of hunting when it was originally arranged to cover many rural concerns, was far too early (a week is a long time in politics as someone once said) and is an event that could never be repeated. The violent threats made by many speakers were just confirmation that they know they're losing but we mustn't allow that to make us complacent. Read New Labour - new hope? again and again: make sure you don't rest until we've won this one. Use the NAHC rally to draw strength from those who share your compassion ...we can do it as it's literally just now been announced that the New Forest Buckhounds are to give up. How many jobs will be lost? Two... surely they can find places on a Government training scheme?

In the last Arkangel, when writing about support for Barry Horne's hunger strike I mentioned that the anti-vivisection organisation Uncaged said, basically, that they did not support him. That was what Barry told me and we believed it to be true at that time but I'm pleased to say it was all a misunderstanding so, sorry to Uncaged (I was at your march and rally in June so I'm sure we haven't fallen out!). It's nice to be proved wrong in such circumstances!

Meanwhile, Consort Kennels have closed, Huntingdon Life Sciences (and Occold) are having real problems, Hillgrove Farm can't hold out much longer and I've just mentioned the New Forest Buckhounds. We're on our way, keep working... keep shouting... keep fighting for animal liberation! We don't want it tomorrow, we want it now... let's all go together and get it!

ANIMAL LIBERATION PRISONERS

Arkangel gives its full support to animal liberation prisoners. We list only the names of prisoners and ask people to contact the ALFSG for up-to-date information, prison numbers and addresses. This is because Arkangel Magazine is produced less frequently than the ALFSG information and could be out of date by the time you read it.

Anti-Veal Calf Demonstrators Get Damages From Warwickshire Police

Warwickshire Police have agreed to pay damages of £15,500 to four demonstrators who were arrested at Coventry Airport between February and April 1995.

Sixty-six year old Patricia Belcher, Helen Lear, Andrew Caines and Brent Reid have been awarded the money in respect of their arrests at Coventry Airport whilst demonstrating against the export of veal calves to the continent via Coventry Airport in 1995.

All four brought actions against Warwickshire Police, claiming damages for assault, unlawful arrest, false imprisonment and malicious prosecution.

John Davis, of Irwin Mitchell Solicitors in Sheffield who took on the case said afterwards:

"These awards clearly demonstrate that a number of peaceful protesters were treated callously by the police. These cases represent typical incidents at Coventry Airport and we are pursuing similar claims for other demonstrators. I am very pleased to have assisted in achieving justice for these people."

Should anyone need to contact John Davis, his telephone number is 0114 2767777, Fax 0114 2753306.

THE ROAD TO VICTORY!

A ground-breaking scientific study, commissioned by the National Trust, has found that an animal hunted by hounds goes through a long, dark agony of fear, stress and utter exhaustion. The staghound packs in the West Country, on Exmoor and the Quantock Hills, can no longer deny their sport is cruel, said Professor Patrick Bateson, a Cambridge University animal behaviour expert. The Trust's council is also expected to call on the Government to commission a study into the stress which hunting with hounds causes to foxes. Red deer are pitifully ill-equipped for pursuit by hunters on horseback with dogs, lacking musculature, being relatively sedentary and lacking the stamina for long moorland chases lasting an average of 3 hours and covering 12 miles but can range for more than 20. Professor Bateson said, from a point of physiology, the results are entirely unambiguous. Pursuits caused their clear blood plasma to become tinged with magenta red with freed haemoglobin; blood levels of stress hormones to leak and continue rising, as did pain-control chemicals. The report says deer which escaped the hounds, about half, suffer severe stress, take days to recover and would probably be left more vulnerable to infection and disease. (Unknown source).

Anna Wintour, editor of US Vogue, known as 'Nuclear Wintour', is the target of PETA, to 'out' her for not giving up furs. She was sent an invite to a PETA fashion bash, and a Wintour look-alike was seen holding a look-alike magazine called 'Morgue'. Morgue splashed across it a teaser; 'What I did with my unwanted beaver' by Anna Wintour. PETA has received a warning from her lawyers, however, PETA is thriving on the publicity.

Legal aid has been awarded to the family of Peter Hall, 20, who died in February 1996 from a new variant CJD, to sue the Government. (Independent 20.3.1997)

People who eat sheep's liver or kidney more than once a week could be at risk from cadmium poisoning, which causes kidney and liver damage. (Independent 20.3.1997)

A survey of meat bought at ten butchers' shops in Edinburgh has revealed cause for concern. In 3 cases out of 10, meat bought contained large amounts of coliforms (bacteria) showing meat is either too old to sell or had not been properly handled. (Independent 20.3.1997)

Between 400 and 500 tons of Toblerone were removed from Swiss stores after they were found to contain illegal genetically altered soya beans. The lecithin posed no health risks, but was illegal under Swiss law. The Swiss Co-op announced it was stopping distribution of selected vegetarian products after some were found to contain genetically modified soya from the United States. (Independent 22.3.1997)

There are about 5,000 pairs of nesting barn owls in the UK. Eggs are incubated for 4 weeks. They feed on voles and rats, hunting at dawn and dusk. (Independent 23.3.1997)

The EC is poised to prosecute Britain in the European Court of Justice over the way farmers dispose of sheep dip chemicals. The poisonous chemicals, implicated in Gulf War syndrome and other chronic illnesses, can still be poured on farmland when mixed with slurry after dipping. The commission's view is that it should go to hazardous waste sites. (Independent 25.3.1997)

Aubrey Hancock, 62, a beef farmer from Alford, Lincolnshire, has been fined £9,000 and ordered to pay £25,000 costs at Lincoln Crown Court for giving false information to support a claim that his cattle had never been exposed to BSE. He admitted 3 charges of providing a false trade description of goods. It is thought to be the first successful prosecution of its kind instigated by the Ministry of Agriculture. (Times 1.4.1997)

Tough safety standards set out last year to eradicate BSE from gelatine are inadequate, the EC's new food health watchdog, the Multi-disciplinary Scientific Commission declared. It said technical treatment conditions imposed on Britain are no guarantee of avoiding contamination. Tougher standards are no doubt bound to be introduced. A decision came as British doctors warned that growth promoters used to produce plump farm animals may pose a risk to humans by encouraging the spread of drug-resistant bacteria. It follows the case of an accident in which a man broke his leg in a chicken factory and his wound became infected with antibiotic resistant bacteria, the same as had colonised the factory. (Independent 4.4.1997)

Shares in Glaxo Wellcome were hit yesterday after it emerged that the UK's biggest drugs company had been forced to issue a warning about the potentially lethal effects of one of its best-selling products, Lamictal, an anti-epilepsy drug launched in Ireland in 1990. It has been implicated in recent tests as the cause of a possibly fatal skin condition in children. Sales of the drug last year were £105m, out of £8.34bn total company sales. The drug has been licensed for use by children in 25 countries. (Independent 4.4.1997)

New hygiene proposals for butchers may be the final nail in the coffin for many small shops. The BSE nightmare has already closed a number of businesses. The massive E.coli virus outbreak in Scotland last year which claimed 18 lives has prompted great concern about shops selling cooked and raw meat. For many years butchers handled raw meat and nothing else, but competition from larger supermarkets forced those businesses to diversify with cooked products and cheese an obvious choice. Now it is likely that separate fridges, counters, and most significantly, staff, will be required for the two distinct ranges. This will make life difficult for the small trader. (Daily Echo 9.4.1997)

Hormone Replacement Therapy (HRT) may be linked to the failure to detect breast cancer as HRT increases the density of the breast tissue, thereby making detection harder in the earlier stages. Interval cancer, cancers detected between mammograph screenings, are 4 times higher in women on HRT. (Independent 11.4.1997)

We should not be surprised by the outbreaks of food poisoning from E.coli 0157. Neither should we be surprised if things get worse. The E.coli disaster was allowed to happen because Britain, wedded to the concept of cheap food, turns as many blind eyes as it takes to revolting farming practices, insanitary food processing and unacceptable quality. We should not be talking about the food chain any more - the poison chains would be a more accurate term. We have simply accepted that salmonella, listeria, BSE and E.coli 0157 are part of our lives. Disgraceful and insanitary practices from farm to fork. It is not an offence to present a dirty animal for slaughter, nor indeed for a dirty animal to be slaughtered. Animals are routinely slaughtered in their own shit. (Observer 13.4.1997)

A rescue plan was launched for the black grouse, which is twice the size of the smaller more abundant red grouse, but is suffering from one of the fastest declines of any British bird species. It is still legally shot for sport. Numbers are down to 6,300 males. The greatest threat to their survival is degradation of their habitat, caused mainly by sheep, which is encouraged by European subsidies. (Independent 16.4.1997)

Scientists at Leicester University have developed a DNA test for animals which could make badger-baiting a thing of the past. The technique allows prosecutors to link any animal matter found on an alleged baiter with a specific animal. In the past, scientists could only say whether or not blood or tissue was from the badger species. This allowed baiters to claim in their defence that they were digging for foxes which is lawful, and that any badger tissue found on them came from the foxes den. It is now being used for the first time in an RSPCA prosecution next month. (Independent 16.4.1997)

A vegetarian chef has won his case that his dole money should not be stopped because he refused to cook meat. Simon Beavis, 25, a vegetarian since the age of 12, argued that his rights had been infringed when officials at his job centre ruled that he was restricting his chances of employment. There is nothing new about transmissible spongiform encephalopathies (TSE). Records show that ovine (sheep) TSE, known as scrapie, was spotted in East Anglian sheep in 1732. From 1913 to 1921, cases of what turned out to be human analogues of scrapie - CJD - was spotted in Germany. Over the years, various diseases joined the TSE camp; transmittable mink encephalopathy (TME) and chronic wasting disease (CWD), a disease of captive mule deer and elk; and in humans Gerstmann-Straussler-Scheinker Syndrome (GSS), fatal familial insomnia (FFI) and, more famously, Kuru. There are more than 20 strains of scrapie, and the hunt for the scrapie agent began in Scotland in the 1930's, following a 1935 disaster when a vaccine for a sheep disease became contaminated with the scrapie agent, killing 1,200 of the animals immunised. Animal Welfare campaigners condemned London Zoo's reintroduction of bears to its newly refurbished Mappin Terrace at Regent's Park after an absence of 12 years. Other animals have been introduced into the zoo enclosure to simulate natural conditions, such as muntjac deer, peacocks and monkeys. The WSPA described the import of two Sri Lankan Sloth bears from Warsaw Zoo as cynical, intended to attract crowds rather than conserve. An animal psychologist Dr. Roger Mugford insisted that no matter what the conditions, the bears always suffer in captivity, and that London Zoo is totally about showbiz. (Independent 1.5.1997)

Welsh bats are poised for a population explosion. Scientists have launched a radio monitoring programme to track the Greater Horseshoe Bat to find out what it likes to eat and where it goes for food. The Countryside Council for Wales hopes that the population can be increased by 25% over the next 12 years by identifying and safeguarding food. The CCW plan is to save and protect 54 endangered species and 12 key habitats in Wales. They include the medicinal leech, the brown hare, corncrake, sand lizard, black bog ant and greater crested newt. (Independent on Sunday 11.5.1997)

Conservationists have made a breakthrough in captive breeding techniques which secure the cannibalistic ladybird spider. Thought to be extinct in Britain, it was rediscovered in the 1980's on a single patch of heath land in Dorset. After clearing encroaching pine trees and rhododendrons, the number of adult spiders has soared to about 100. After removing a small number, they were bred with spiders from Denmark. The mother lays up to 80 eggs which, once hatched, eat their mother's regurgitated food, then her. (Independent 14.5.1997)

Glaxo Wellcome and Zeneca, two of the UK's biggest pharmaceutical groups, are withholding all new business from the controversial animal testing company, Huntingdon Life Sciences, one of the UK's largest animal testing contract companies. Zeneca has used the laboratories for at least 15 years. This follows the Swedish drug giant Astra's decision not to use Huntingdon any longer. Existing work for all, including SmithKline, will continue. It follows a Channel 4 documentary which showed Huntingdon's employees kicking and hurling a beagle against a wall. The Home Office has since removed the licences of several technicians and begun a wider enquiry. (Independent 17.5.1997)

The number of vegetarians in Britain is growing by more than 5,000 a week, and more than 8 million in Britain have cut red meat completely from their diet, according to a survey. It concludes that 13,000 a week are removing red meat from their dinner tables, while more than half the population has reduced the amount they eat. BSE was the primary reason for more than 20% of those questioned. The number of vegetarians is now 3 million. (Independent 20.5.1997)

Jamie MacLaren, 34, of Montague Road, North End, Portsmouth, and his brother Lee MacLaren, 35, of Braintree Road, Paulsgrove, Portsmouth, were fined £90,000 each after admitting taking and possessing rare birds' eggs in the Orkney Islands. They admitted 70 charges under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 when they appeared at Kirkwall Sheriff Court yesterday. They have 4 weeks to make arrangements to pay the fine. The eggs belonged to the hen harrier, red-throated diver, merlin, dunlin, curlew, fulmar and starling species - 17 were from specially protected birds. Only 20 pairs of the rare merlin and less than 120 pairs of the red-throated diver exist in Orkney. Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act, jail terms are not allowed, but they could go to prison for not paying their fines. (Fareham & Gosport News 28.5.1997)

The Government will this week announce tough new regulations to control the transport of live animals, and new powers to take trucks with the worst conditions off the road. The Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will specify maximum journey and minimum rest times for different species. The Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order will create powers to disqualify transporters who seriously or persistently break the regulations. Vets will be given the ability to take action even if the abuses take place outside the UK. The new powers will come into force on 1st July, and will also insist on staff being properly trained and having practical experience in handling animals. (Independent on Sunday 8.6.1997)

Police are investigating the death of a cow forced to drink 4 bottles of whiskey at a Spanish village fiesta after men took the horned breeding cow to the fiesta for a mock bull fight. They had not obtained a permit. 13 men aged between 19 and 26 had been questioned. They face fines of up to £43,000 if convicted. (Guardian 9.6.1997)

Cases of food poisoning have rocketed by more than 400% in the past decade. 20 people died in the Scottish E.coli outbreak. 84,348 in England & Wales and a further 4,940 in Scotland were hit by food poisoning. And in a poll conducted for the Food & Drinks Federation, 6% of adults claimed to have felt unwell after eating. Two stag hunts yesterday failed to get a High Court order allowing them to continue hunting on National Trust land. Both hunts, the Quantock Staghounds and the Devon and Somerset Staghounds, will have to severely curtail their activities from 1st August. Both hunts used the land on 200 days a year, and said in evidence that hunting would cease if the courts did not intervene. The Trust made its decision to ban deer hunting on its land in April after a report by Sir Patrick Bateson that it was cruel and that the animals suffered severe and unnatural stress from being chased miles by hounds. The £20,000 costs were awarded against the two hunts. (Guardian 17.7.1997)

Featured article to insert.

The original article seems to have got lost in the post so this article appears as an insert. You may have to use a magnifying glass to read it but at least the whole article fits on one side! Also, the added advantage of it being an insert is that it is easier to recycle!!

Press Office trials and tribulations.

By the time you read this the latest stage of Hampshire lunacy will be under way with my trial at Portsmouth Crown Court for alleged Conspiracy to Incite Criminal Damage and Arson between 1991 and 1996. Expected to last for at least two months the proceedings take place against the backdrop of Simon Russell, ex-SG Newsletter editor, being acquitted at last years trial, the three Green Anarchist editors out on bail pending appeal and the general editor of GA still waiting to apply for a separate trial from me! Bookies are rumoured to be offering odds on that Detective Supt. Desmond Thomas (Hampshire's answer to "Carry on Constable") will have a nervous breakdown in the witness box.

A (Wait)Rose by any other name...Like John Lewis?

Last November the Animal Liberation Front issued a statement that said if the John Lewis Partnership did not stop the pheasant shoots on its Hampshire estate then all John Lewis and Waitrose properties would be considered legitimate targets. So far, numerous windows have disappeared, £20,000 worth of damage was caused to lorries at the John Lewis depot in Stevenage and, at the time of writing this, a three and a half hour long attack by activists on the Leckford Abbas estate in Hampshire freed hundreds of pheasants and trashed nearly twenty rearing sheds. Meanwhile, the National Anti-Hunting Campaign continues its very active boycott campaign...

More Provo's emerge!

Last year's Provisional RSPCA (see previous issue) has been joined by the Provisional ALF which sent out hoax parcel bombs to twenty targets including Maggie Jennings, head of the RSPCA's Research Animals Dept, described as "a vivisectioners lackey", and David Hammond who tried to rip off the Justice For Keith Mann Campaign (see current ALFSG Newsletter). Dave claims that what he did is legal. Well, so is vivisection! The remaining 18 recipients were all animal abusers, including Hillgrove Farm, Bernard Matthews, Colchester Zoo, the Roslin Institute, Huntingdon Life Sciences, a dog breeder....and the John Lewis estate in Hampshire. A claim from the Provisional ALF revealed that the hoax devices were video cassette boxes containing cat litter and a diagram showing how a real bomb could easily have been constructed instead. The statement said that devices sent after April will be viable ones.

Poetic Justice!

Our non-human brothers and sisters appear to have been undertaking a bit of direct action themselves recently.....the master of Tickham Hunt fell off his horse who promptly trampled him. Kent's air ambulance had to be called out.....a farmer at Higher Trebarveth in Cornwall died when several bulls crushed him against a shed wall.....ramblers crossing a farm in Derbyshire were chased by an ostrich who knocked one down before kicking and pecking him, ripping his anorak to shreds.....a person in Copenhagen choked to death after swallowing a live canary to impress friends.....one man died of a heart attack and twenty people were injured when a bull crashed through barriers at a Spanish bull fight near Valencia.....a large school of herring caught in a trawler's nets dived en masse to the ocean floor dragging the 63ft vessel down with them. Six crew members abandoned ship off the Norwegian coast.....and finally, the tiger who bit off the limb belonging to a Chipperfield's trainer must have been in a very radical group as the ARM was involved!

And Finally...

Actions at all levels are increasing as disgust over New Labour's broken promises, determination to close Hillgrove Farm and Huntingdon Life Sciences and anger at disgraceful prison sentences reach unprecedented heights. Compassion is not a crime, justice is not a crime, truth is not a crime. It is animal abuse itself that incites people to fight the obscenities of animal abuse.....how dare the State try to suppress our movement while protecting the evils of vivisection, animal farming, bloodsports and all the other horrors.

We can win, we must win and - fighting together - WE WILL WIN!

Robin Webb.

Introduction to Issue 19

Firstly, we'd like to say a few words about Arkangel. We are completely independent of any other organisation and completely self sufficient. Arkangel Magazine is produced solely with voluntary help and our aims are to further the cause of animal liberation. We provide useful information to those involved in the animal liberation movement, a resource for other readers, such as school students, a forum for debate on animal liberation issues and an update on all animal liberation activities. We rely for the content on contributions from readers in the form of reports, letters, artwork, newspaper cuttings and articles and we try to make each issue as diverse as possible - but we need your help to achieve this.

A Brief History

Arkangel was founded by animal liberationists Ronnie Lee and Vivian Smith in 1989. The first issue attracted a great deal of interest because its content combined animal liberation activities with general animal rights and animal welfare campaigning reports, news of hunt sabotage and a list of successes under the heading 'Road to Victory'. All was going well until Vivian and fellow worker Keith were arrested in October 1991 for matters unrelated to the production of Arkangel Magazine. Subsequently, the powers-that-be took into their possession the issue that they were working on, the incomplete Issue Number 6 (which is the reason why it is missing from some people's collections!) Certain other important items such as subscribers mailing lists went the same way so, basically, Arkangel was in a bit of a predicament. However, after a couple of months, other people stepped in and put things back on course, producing Issue Number 7 in early 1992.

Which Brings us to Now!

Arkangel Magazine has, over the past six years, had its financial ups and downs. This has been mainly due to the fact that the editors have wanted to keep the price of subscriptions as low as possible for as long as possible, while producing a magazine of a high quality. However, printing and postal costs do not remain static and the result of this led to Issue number 18 finding itself in debt at the time of printing. Which leads us on to a necessary subscription price rise. From Issue number 20, four issues will cost £10 (p&p inc.). The unwaged cost will stay at its present £6 and the overseas rate will stay at £15. The cover price will rise to £2.

We send our sincere thanks to those who have generously donated money to help us to produce and distribute this magazine. We would also like to take this opportunity to thank the regular contributors.

Where Now?

The animal liberation movement has seen a few victories, many defeats and an awful lot of pain over the past 20 years. A change of government brought about, well just that, a change of government, nothing more. People in other countries look upon the UK as some kind of haven for animals but nothing could be further from the truth! During 1997, this so-called 'nation of animal lovers' allowed the killing of thousands of stray dogs, 60,000 mink in small cages in 15 fur farms to be turned into fur coats, consumed 720 million factory farmed animals, reared and shot about 100 million game birds, experimented on millions of animals and tore to pieces about 20,000 foxes. The list goes on...

The Way Forward

In the past 20 years we have seen a massive increase in the awareness of the general public with tens of thousands becoming vegan. The amount of alternative non-animal products in the shops is testimony to the way many people now see animals - not as machines or merely produce, but living sentient beings. There are numerous reasons why this new awareness has come about and it is mainly through the work of the animal liberation movement. Whether people are involved in direct action, in national and local animal rights groups or whether they are individuals who fight tirelessly for the liberation of animals from pain and suffering, they all play a part in the raising of awareness regarding the exploitation of animals. Every aspect of campaigning has its place.

We encourage support for the Animal and Earth Liberationists currently languishing in prison, put there by a corrupt and morally bankrupt system, one which makes heroes of murderers and torturers and locks up the defenders of the innocent.

The Road to Victory

The Animal Liberation Movement is relatively young and we have a long way to go until we can honestly say that an end to the abuse of animals is within our sights. We encourage people within the movement to work together (a good example of how not to do this was demonstrated recently when the League Against Cruel Sports, the RSPCA and IFAW actually encouraged its members not to attend the NAHC anti-hunting march through London!). A good example of how great results can be achieved was demonstrated in the 1980s when the ALF, LYNX and local animal rights campaigners decimated the fur trade in the UK.

As we stated in a previous issue of Arkangel Magazine - we would like to be able to say that animal liberation is just around the corner, but the road to victory is very long and the corner is a very long way off. However, if we keep moving towards that point and we keep fighting for what we believe in we shall rid the world of the sick, depraved and thoroughly disgusting abuse that animals have endured for so long. The animal liberation movement has the resources, the numbers and the commitment to achieve its aims and objectives. With solidarity on our side and not fragmentation, which only serves to make us weaker, we shall eventually achieve our goal - animal liberation and the preservation of the Earth.

Southern Animal Rights Coalition

SARC is a coalition of local animal rights and hunt sab groups in Dorset, Hampshire and West Sussex. Collectively they organise protests, demonstrations, direct actions and hunt sabotage to save animals and highlight their suffering.

Animals desperately need the active support of all compassionate people. In our current uncaring society they are the helpless victims of oppression. Our species exploits them ruthlessly - for food, clothing, sport and so-called scientific progress. It is difficult for members of the public to relate to the cruelty involved because it is carefully and deliberately concealed by those with vested interests.

When atrocities in factory farms, circuses, hunting and vivisection are exposed by video evidence obtained by animal rights activists, most decent people are horrified at the cruelty involved. It is our job to convert these humane and compassionate feelings into effective and meaningful actions.

SARC organises letter-writing campaigns, petitions, fund-raising events, information stalls, protests, demonstrations and takes direct action to save animals from suffering. The more that awareness of the suffering of animals is raised and the more people that become involved the quicker the suffering will be diminished.

News from Animal Aid

Animal Aid have produced an excellent and shocking report entitled: 'A Brutal Business - An Investigation into the Treatment of Animals at Livestock Markets'.

The purpose of the report is to alert the British public to the wholly unnecessary pain and stress endured by the 20 million sheep, pigs and cattle sent to market every year en route to the slaughterhouse or to a second farmer for 'finishing'.

The brutal treatment of 20 million animals, hit with sticks, kicked with boots and prodded with electric goads goes on amid farmers justifying the harsh treatment with words such as: "It doesn't matter, they'll be dead by the morning".

Following the furore that greeted the publication of Animal Aid's first report on the conditions at animal markets 'Auctioning Animal Flesh', in 1993, Animal Aid established a network of voluntary market monitors - known as MarketWatch. These are ordinary people who care about animal suffering and have taken the trouble to inform themselves about the law and about the general principles of animal husbandry. They regularly visit one or more local markets and, where possible, work closely with Trading Standards Officers of local councils - the government's official enforcement authority.

In the words of Juliette Gardner, Essex MarketWatch monitor: "Once you spend time with and touch animals in markets you feel responsible for them. You want to ensure that they aren't kicked, punched or beaten; that if one is injured you are there to make certain it is treated; or if one is thirsty you can get it water". Animal Aid's ultimate objective is to encourage people to adopt a meat-free diet but for so long as animals are raised and slaughtered for meat they believe the animals should be spared the wholly unnecessary additional hardships of a day at market. If you are willing and able to offer your assistance by being a MarketWatch monitor then you should contact Animal Aid.

Sheep Race Victory

A series of sheep races were planned for the village of Thornborough in Buckinghamshire last year but were halted after complaints were made by Animal Aid. Thanks to coverage of the proposed event in the Daily Express, two local newspapers, national and local radio and regional TV, the sheep race organisers switched plans and staged races involving villagers dressed in sheep costumes and others where wooden sheep were pulled along.

Meat Out

It was reported in the February 1998 issue of 'Outrage' that, following a survey conducted by Realeat, 5000 people are giving up meat every week. 5.4% of the population are now vegetarian - an increase of 20% since 1995. Health implications and mounting animal welfare concerns have ensured that the number of vegetarians in the UK continues to grow.

Kennel Plans Refused

A planning application to extend kennel facilities at Glencrest Kennels in Copley, Co. Durham, has been refused. The kennel owners who have bred cats and dogs for the pet industry for decades, were strongly suspected to have been planning to breed dogs for vivisection.

Planning Consultant, Tony Keen, will generously offer advice to Animal Aid members on animal-related planning applications. Opposing applications can be complicated - local councils will only take note of 'material' planning considerations. Professional advice is invaluable. If you need help with objecting to an application in your area, contact Tony on: 01622 814640 (daytime).

Membership Details

£12 waged, £ 8 unwaged (or aged 17), £5 youth (16 or under), £15 for all supporters overseas. £200 life membership.

Animal Aid members automatically receive the magazine 'Outrage' 4 times a year, a membership card, Animal Aid badge and a window sticker. Membership also entitles you to a range of mail order and High Street discounts. Ask for details.

UKAVIS

UKAVIS produces leaflets for distribution to the general animal rights / anti-vivisection movement. The leaflets show that vivisection is a medically unworkable methodology - so that all the grand claims made for it have no basis in reality. The general public still do not realise that vivisection is not only cruel but is also a meaningless and frequently misleading pseudo-science which actually hinders medical progress, rather than advancing it. If you order more than 400 leaflets, you can have them for the discounted price of £2 per 100.

SANCTUARIES

Freshfields Animal Rescue Centre
East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell,
Liverpool L29 3AE
Tel: 0151 931 1604 / Fax: 0151 924 6010

Illustration by Guy Troughton

The Rescue Centre has been running for 22 years. Most of the work at the centre involves the rescue and re-homing of dogs and cats as there is such a massive stray problem on Merseyside, but they are by no means the only animals which are abandoned or neglected.

In the past year, the Centre have taken in quite a few birds such as cockatiels, budgies and lovebirds. Most of the birds in the aviary are strays whose owners did not claim them. They do, however, live quite happily enjoying the company of their own kind with a reasonable amount of space to fly around in, compared to the poor birds who endure their miserable lives in tiny cages. The Centre have also taken in several terrapins, an epileptic chipmunk, numerous gerbils and dozens of unwanted rabbits. Recently, the Centre rescued 10 baby goats and sheep which were due to be slaughtered.

As well as the resident pigs at Freshfields, the Centre recently took in several other unwanted pigs. Frank, a pink pot-bellied, came from a back garden in Liverpool and George, a young black pig had been kept in a flat. They do try to re-home pigs whenever possible but good homes for this sort of animal are few and far between. At the present time, Freshfields have nine ponies in their care and during the summer of 1997 had 150 cats and kittens so you can well imagine the cost that is required to keep the Centre running smoothly. The vet bill alone is around £3,000 a month and having just been given planning permission to convert part of the existing house into a veterinary surgery and converting the barn into staff accommodation, the Centre needs to raise in the region of £25,000. If there are any fundraisers out there, please get in touch as soon as possible.

There are various other ways you can help Freshfields:

- ◆ Sponsor an animal at the Shelter. Contact them for details
- ◆ Sponsor a Kennel - For a donation of £300 or more a plaque will be engraved to place on a kennel.
- ◆ Pet wall of Remembrance - For a donation of £30 you can have a permanent memorial for a much loved pet (wording of your choice).

- ◆ Write for leaflets, posters, etc. to distribute or put in shops, schools and libraries, etc.
- ◆ Take a collecting box.
- ◆ Collect jumble, bric-a-brac and saleable items for the Shelter's charity shops at 28 & 73 St. Johns Road, Waterloo (0151 474 2183); 42a Station Road, Ainsdale, Southport; and 10 North Road, St. Helens (01744 611044).
- ◆ Freshfields are always looking for reliable helpers in the different areas of Liverpool, Southport and St. Helens with a car and phone who would pick up jumble/animals, etc. Also people to do home checks (urgently needed) in South Liverpool.
- ◆ Any genuine offers to provide the animals with good homes are welcome, but we are very strict on re-homing. Do not be offended if you are asked lots of questions to ascertain your caring attitude.
- ◆ Please remember Freshfields in your will and if you wish them to take care of your animals (please make your wishes known to your solicitor).
- ◆ Items that are always needed are blankets, jumpers, newspapers, metal buckets, dog and cat feeding bowls, puppy chews, greens (for rabbits), cat carrying baskets, dog collars, leads, tools (i.e. hammers, screwdrivers, spades, etc.), boiler suits, overalls, roofing felt and bread (for ducks and hens), and last but not least, any donation that you can spare.

Hounslow Animal Welfare Society
PO Box 234, Hounslow, Middlesex TW3 2QG
Tel: 0181 560 5443

The Society has, in the past year, taken into its care for re-homing, dogs, cats, rabbits, chinchillas, guinea pigs, terrapins, rats and hamsters. The Society also aided over 100 animals mostly with routine and veterinary treatment but also by the provision of transport, occasional temporary accommodation and assistance in helping people with their animals in times of need. If possible, please donate animal food which will leave other money for essentials such as medical bills. Just £2 a month will help pay for the treatment of sick or injured animals.

Hillside was founded to help all animals in need, particularly those who suffer in the intensive factory farming industry. If you would like to adopt one of the rescued animals (only £6 minimum a year) please write for details. Hillside also have an extensive range of merchandise available and the Sanctuary produces a very informative magazine packed with information - Contact Hillside if you can help them in any way.

Pigeon Recovery
8 Vermont Road, Sutton, Surrey SM1 3EQ
Tel: 0181 644 7349

Lyn and Maggie Allen take in injured pigeons and lovingly nurse them back to health before releasing them back into the wild. Because pigeons are generally given very little regard, their work is all the more difficult and they rely upon donations, no matter how small, to be able to continue with their important work.

Animals in Need / Maxicare Dogs
PO Box 145, Northampton NN1 3EQ
Tel: 01604 231075 / Fax: 01604 604343

Animals in Need have rescued hundreds of animals over the years and are always in need of help both voluntary and financial. At present they have several young hedgehogs in their care which are underweight. They will be released in the spring when the weather gets warmer and they are fit and well. You can sponsor a hedgehog for £3 a week. The money will go towards the cost of food, bedding, heating and veterinary treatment. Also, Maxicare Dogs have several dogs in their care which have been with them for quite some time now and will continue to stay with them until suitable homes can be found. If you are willing to sponsor a dog for a day, week, month or however long you would like, it would be much appreciated. If you feel you can help then please contact the telephone number/address above.

Farm Animal Rescue Sanctuary
25 Springhill Road, Fen Drayton,
Cambridge CB4 5SR
Tel / Fax: 01954 230988

The Sanctuary was set up 8 years ago and over 500 animals have been rescued during this time including lambs, sheep, goats, calves, bullocks, piglets and chickens. Many had suffered injury, cruelty, neglect or were too old and worn out after years of breeding. Many were infant lambs whom farmers just wanted to be rid of. The Farm Animal Rescue Sanctuary is run on a purely voluntary basis, and relies solely upon donations. All the money goes directly to helping the animals. Operating costs are high - animal feed, veterinary attention and farm maintenance takes a great deal of money - and at the present time the lack of funds has reached a crisis point.

Carole Webb (founder) works an eighteen-hour day, week in week out, without ever having a day off. This she can manage, her love for the animals keeps her going. However, financial worries on top of this work load cause stress and makes her task much more difficult.

There is a special appeal to keep this oasis for ex-farm animals safe and financially secure. If 1,000 people paid just £2 per month (only 50p a week) the Sanctuary would be secure so here is a case where so little could achieve so much!

If you are able to help please send donations to: Kaylie Day (Trustee), 59 Edgell Road, Staines, Middlesex TW18 2EP Tel: 01784 461360.

Tail Ends
PO Box 1550, London SW4 6HP

Tail Ends is a small vegan animal rescue network which needs homes for abused and abandoned animals - mainly cats and dogs. All the money, which is desperately needed, goes towards animal food, vet's bills, neutering and spaying.

Wildlife Aid

Leatherhead, Surrey KT22 0AL
Tel: 01372 377332
Emergency helpline: 0839 800132

Simon Cowell, ex-city broker, gave up his job to care for wildlife and set up Wildlife Aid. So far, thousands of creatures have been nursed back to health including bats, fallow deer, badgers, foxes, hedgehogs and owls. It makes a nice change not to have to report the centre is struggling because of lack of help and money, although volunteers are always needed. Wildlife Aid, at present, have over 100 volunteers, and Simon has managed to find sponsors for the centre whilst successfully seeking gifts such as equipment from hospitals. He has also built up a 2,000-strong membership. If you would like more information, contact the address above.

Hen Heaven Sanctuary
Linda Turvey, Squirrels Farm, near Henfield,
West Sussex Tel: 01273 495614

Hen Heaven is home to former battery hens and turkeys. Linda Turvey, who runs the sanctuary in West Sussex, would appreciate any help towards the cost of feed, vet bills and materials. More than 400 hens and chickens, along with 50 turkeys live there and, as you can imagine, costs are high.

There are numerous other animal sanctuaries in the British Isles (far too many to list) and if you would like to find out about these, write to:

Special Appeal: Celia Hammond Animal Trust

Do you want to do something practical for animals? Celia Hammond Animal Trust in Lewisham, SE London, urgently needs volunteers - attached to the Trust's low cost neuter clinic for cats and dogs. They need help cleaning and feeding the animals and also with their rescue work. Ability to drive would be an advantage but is not essential. Accommodation can be provided. Live-in volunteers are also needed for the same sort of work at the sanctuary near Hastings. Hard, but rewarding work in beautiful surroundings.

Save the Rhino

97% of the world's rhino population has been wiped out in the last 30 years. The plight of the rhino is one of the most urgent global issues. Save The Rhino International (SRI) is a small, dynamic charity that has at its core aim the protection of this endangered species. The 460 square kilometre Kaziranga National Park is a haven for two-thirds of all living Indian rhino. With one guard for every square km, it should be one of the most protected parks, but at least one rhino every fortnight is poached, due to the high commercial demand for rhino horn in the Far East. (The current figure stands at anywhere between 25 and 50 victims per year.)

Save The Rhino International has set a target of £1m to establish the Indian Rhino Fund to support India and Nepal's rhinos. The aim is to emphasise the vital role rural communities play in the survival of all endangered species, by funding projects whereby the local communities become guardians of the wildlife. All money raised will be used to fund projects that will contribute to the co-existence of the people and the wildlife to ensure long-term security of all the endangered animals in the area.

Rescues Against Greyhound Subsidies

RAGS have a campaign motto which reads: "A greyhound bred... is a greyhound dead".

RAGS are running a campaign against the proposed European grants for Irish farmers to increase the number of greyhounds that are bred each year by a staggering 50%. The EU have proposed grant aid for the development of the Greyhound Industry, which means the number of greyhounds exported from Ireland will rise by 5,000, from a baseline in 1993 of 10,000 dogs to a projected forecast of 15,000 by the year 1999.

RAGS are opposed to these grants, and with a steady decline in attendance figures at NGRC tracks and track closures these grants are totally unjustifiable.

ANIMAL RIGHTS CAMBRIDGE

Animal Rights Cambridge, Animal Aid and Huntingdon Animal Concern were heavily involved in the setting up and continuation of Camp Rena, the eviction from the first site and the establishment of the second camp on the same day in a field by the A1 motorway, in sight of Huntingdon Life Sciences. There were many arrests at the time of eviction and at the various demonstrations. The four people who got onto the roof of the buildings were also arrested and charged. There was good media coverage.

There has been a great deal of support from animal rights groups around the country, from people from various peace camps and from road protesters who campaigned with the camp bringing gifts of food, money and materials.

Other activities have included a fast which raised over £750 and a graphic exhibition of primate photographs supplied by Mike Nunn, from the Shamrock Farm campaign group. Animal Rights Cambridge are planning a continuous hunger strike for July, outside the main entrance of Huntingdon Life Sciences, with campaigners fasting for various periods according to their strength. For further details you should contact Joan on the number below or Sue on 01223 8924435.

Animal Rights Cambridge and Animal Aid meet every last Monday of the month at the Bath House, Gwydir Street, Cambridge and hold a weekly stall in the market. The group has been actively involved in the setting up of the Huntingdon Death Sciences Campaign raising £1,600 for office equipment, etc. and after a four day fast raised a further £1,800 which was needed to re-home several distressed primates with animal rights campaigners. The money was used to pay vet and licence fees. The fast was also in support of 660 primates held in HLS.

The group has also given a great deal of support to the Hillgrove campaign as well as local hunt sab groups. A telephone and information helpline (when National groups offices are closed) is available; contact Joan's number. The group is currently supporting the campaign to stop the lethal control of pigeons in Cambridge and are in consultation with the local wildlife hospital (C.A.R.E.S.).

Vegan Village

You can find everything you need that's vegan at the virtual village for vegans on the Internet. Vegan gifts, vegan footwear, vegan chocolates, vegan perfume, vegan contacts, vegan books and magazines, vegan solicitors, vegan everything!

The Story so Far

The Vegan Village was established in September 1997 in order to provide a listing on the Internet where vegans could track down goods and services offered by fellow vegans. In the first three months over 70 individuals and companies joined the Vegan Village. The Vegan Village website has been visited by over 2000 people, who between them have looked at over 6000 pages of information. Not all the visitors are from the UK: Approximately half are from overseas - many are from the USA but there are also some from Europe and even Japan!

The Vegan Village is divided into categories. The most looked at category is Shoes and Clothes, with almost a quarter of all visitors looking at the entries in that category. The top 10 looked-at categories are as follows:

Shoes & Clothes
Food & Drink
Eating Out Contacts
Books & Gifts Shops Beauty Products Services
Accommodation Health

Plans for the Future

So far, interest in the Vegan Village has been generated by word of mouth and by the search engines on the Internet. Marketing activity to vegan consumers will be stepped up in Spring 1998 when the Vegan Village will be marketed proactively through direct mail, advertising and publicity.

Everybody listed on the Vegan Village is invited to use the Internet address - www.veganvillage.co.uk - on brochures and leaflets, headed paper, press releases and in advertisements.

Angling No Longer Neglected "The vitriol against fishing is no longer a drip, drip, drip. It is a torrent, with high-profile people briefed by so-called spin doctors, using the mass media to indoctrinate the masses with the views of the minority." ... John Kelly, editor of Angling Times, 4.3.98.

National Anti-Angling Week

June 13th-20th 1998

June 16th is the start of the angling season. Although the close season has been scrapped on many waters, a large number of anglers still turn out on the 16th to 'celebrate' the traditional start of the season.

Make sure you're there to greet them!

A selection of the many demos:

Sunday 14th Angling sab, meet 10am Kings Cross tube (outside WHSmiths), London.

Monday 15th Anti-angling stalls and picket/stunt at tackle shop, meet 10am Kings Cross tube (outside WHS), London.

Tues 16th Angling sab, meet 10am Kings Cross tube (outside WHS), London.

Date to be confirmed Demo and presentation of livebaiting petition, at the Environment Agency, Bristol.

If you can't get to these why not organise your own:

- Leafleting/rooftop demo/occupation of your local fishing tackle shop.
- Anti-angling street stall.
- Angling sabotage.
- Write to your local press to raise awareness of the cruelty inherent in angling.
- Contact CAA nearer the time for more details of actions during the week.
- Let us know about your actions so that we can tell others!

Before NAAW

- Please get signatures for the livebaiting petition.

CAA now has limited funds to give to bonafide local groups organising actions/campaigns against angling. Send us a rough plan of your project and estimate of cost.

Please send me:

- ☐ livebaiting petition.
- ☐ general anti-angling leaflets (50p per 100).
- ☐ full colour youth leaflets (£1 per 100).
- ☐ sheets of stickers (20p a sheet).
- ☐ info sheet no.9 - Achieving a local authority ban on angling.
- ☐ info sheet no.10 - Tactics for sabbing angling.
- ☐ info sheet no.11 - Writing to and dealing with the press.
- ☐ general information pack.

Name: _____

Address: _____

Angling Sabbing

- Take a dinghy or canoe onto the water to prevent anglers casting or make them reel in.
- Swim, wade or splash feet in the water.
- Make noise above and in the water.
- Use poles (eg bamboo canes tied together) to disturb the line or float.
- Aim a high powered water pistol at the angler's float/line.

SABBING NEWS

HUNTING'S NAZI LINKS

A recent issue of 'Earth Dog - Running Dog' magazine, the house journal of terrier men and those who hunt with lurcher dogs, has recently contained outrageously racist articles. The magazine is a trade member of the British Field Sports Society, and carries its logo.

A leading article in the publication criticised black Labour MP Oona King, an opponent of fox hunting, and also spouted a racist diatribe against black Londoners. The editor is David Harcombe, a terrier man with the Cwrtycadno fox hunt in mid-Wales, who wrote the article. Ms King, MP for Bethnal Green and Bow, had appeared on Question Time when she spoke against hunting.

Note: Terrier men are unsavoury characters who follow fox hunts in jeeps and Land Rovers with spades and fox terriers. Their job is to 'dig out' foxes who find sanctuary underground. Terriers are also used to flush out the fox, which is then supposed to be shot. Often however, the fox will be captured alive to be illegally released in front of the hounds, or be used for some other torture. Terrier men are often also involved in badger baiting.

The neo-nazi British National Party also had a presence on the Countryside March, distributing pro-bloodsports leaflets to the assembled in-breds.

ANTI-HUNT PROTESTERS SABOTAGE MARCH FM

Hackers claiming to be hunt saboteurs 'hi-jacked' the Countryside March's temporary radio station to broadcast their own message. March FM went off-air in some areas of London and listeners heard music and a voice saying they were tuned in to 'the Hunt Saboteur's Broadcasting Corporation'. Tens of thousands of people streamed into London for the march. However, it is believed that about 15% of them were anti-hunt protesters.

BADGER TERM JAIL STAYED

Two men sent to prison for digging badger setts have been returned to jail after their appeal against conviction and sentence was thrown out by a judge at Oxford Crown Court. David Clark, 37 and Richard Underhill, 38, took their protest before judge Charles Harris after Banbury Magistrates gave them 60-day sentences for attempting to take badgers, sending a dog into a badger sett and damaging a sett in August 1996. Clark, of Bentley Close, Lillington, Leamington Spa, Warwickshire, and Underhill, of Abbey Lane, Southam, near Banbury, claimed they were digging into the sett, at Great Bourton, near Banbury, to rescue their terrier, which had run into the badger sett.

Judge Harris ordered the men serve the remaining time of their original sentences, and gave them 30 days each on the other 2 charges, to run concurrently with their longer sentence.

'MEN IN BLACK' TERRORISE HUNT

The Vale of Aylebury foxhunt, based in Buckinghamshire, got a taste of the public anger which followed the throwing-out of the Mike Foster Bill to ban hunting. A hundred sabs turned up at the hunt's final meet to stop the scum from torturing wildlife.

During the course of the day several members of the hunt were violently assaulted by activists. Christopher Henry, 55, one of the joint masters of the hunt who was in charge, said: "I have never seen anything quite like this, nor come across people who were so determined to do harm. They were all in black, everything, coats, jeans and balaclavas. They had all sorts of things with them. It was absolutely terrifying. There were masses of them. They were not interested in the hunting, they just wanted to get someone." The hunt chairman, John Gardiner, described the attackers as "anarchists". He said: "It's extremely distressing. Someone could have been killed."

PORTMAN HUNT ATTACKED

Michael Tory, joint master of the Portman, said that up to 80 saboteurs had attacked its meet, again arriving in a fleet of large vans. He said that the gang split up and attacked in several places, with the worst incidents coming close to the meeting place of the hunt where a sports pavilion was broken into. "They smashed up furniture and then used the pieces as weapons," he said.

Tim Goodings, the Hunt Saboteurs Association's southern spokesman, claimed the hunt employed a 'flying squad' to beat up protesters. "Now huntsmen and followers know what it's like to be on the receiving end of violence."

POLICE HARASS KENT HUNT SABS

Kent hunt saboteurs have been on the receiving end of severe harassment by the local police over the last year or so. Here are a few incidents:

■ In the summer a court case was adjourned due to "police intimidation of witnesses" because police had cameras and videos outside the court filming all the witnesses and supporters. That night one sab was sacked from his job as his employers mysteriously found out about a conviction from over a decade ago. The next night a sab's car was broken into and documents taken, though valuables left behind.

■ A sab was visited by police on suspicion of murder. Police claimed everyone in the local area with previous convictions for violent offences were visited. However, the sab was only on bail for common assault on a huntsman (not very serious) and several of his neighbours (who were not visited) had previous for GBH and other violent offences.

■ Last Boxing Day a sab van was stopped for not having a petrol cap and given a prohibition notice. The petrol cap had been stolen by the hunt earlier that day. The driver was charged with driving an un-roadworthy vehicle, overloading and dangerous driving and subsequently fined £85.

■ The same day a sab was ridden down and hospitalised. The police refused to take any action.

■ On 20 August, after the hunt had packed up, Maidstone police arrived and started pushing and hitting a sab with a video camera, pulling CS gas out but not actually using it. Another sab had Antimate taken off him, had it sprayed in his eyes and given back.

■ On 29 August a sab van was towed away by police and the driver arrested for suspicion of theft of a motor vehicle as he couldn't remember the address of the registered owner.

■ On 15 September, a sab was arrested for swearing as he was being jostled and threatened by hunt scum with sticks. A fight occurred between sabs and police when police tried to steal a sab video camera. The camera was smashed and the tape seized. When sabs went to the police station to make a complaint they were locked in, videoed and several arrested.

■ On 27 September, a sab was ridden down by the Master of the East Kent foxhounds and received a serious head injury. Police refused to act unless the person injured gave them the details of all the sabs present that day.

■ On 8 October, three sabs were arrested and threatened with CS gas for criminal trespass and criminal damage on the say-so of the hunt.

■ On 11 October, two sabs were driven into by a 'quad' bike. One was impaled on the front and driven at speed for 50m before the driver stopped and beat the sab with a stick. Another sab was held down and beaten with an iron bar, kicked and punched by six scum, who even took photos of the attack. Police arrived and arrested the injured sab(!) for assault, as one of the scum had a cut on the side of their head which required six stitches. The sab was taken to hospital and miraculously escaped any fractures but sustained severe bruising and swelling.

■ On 18 October, a sab was driven over by a horsebox. Police saw the event and arrested the sab(!) for criminal damage. In the confrontation that followed police used extendable batons and CS gas sprays. One woman was hit in the face with a baton and another punched in the face after being arrested for breach of the peace. Three sabs were arrested for affray, two for offensive weapons. One sab was sprayed in the face with CS gas. The arrested sabs were made to kneel handcuffed by the side of the road and slapped about by police. A police officer received a nasty bruise over his eye.

■ Police regularly follow sabs home, and also harass and video sabs at petrol stations, meaning sabs have to pay for their petrol wearing balaclavas(!).

■ The current master of the Ashford Valley foxhounds is Matthew Knight - the solicitor to the Master of Foxhounds Association - and the man responsible on numerous occasions for persuading police not to arrest hunt scum for serious assaults on sabs.

OBITUARIES

A gamekeeper killed himself because he feared the campaign to ban bloodsports would cost him his job and tied cottage. A shooting party found Donald Sedgwick, 63, lying in undergrowth on the 1,700-acre Melton Constable estate near Fakenham, Norfolk, where he'd worked for 32 years.

A huntsman died on the Chiddingfold, Lecontree and Cowdray hunt on Monday 2nd February after falling from his horse and suffering head injuries. The police helicopter had to be called out in order to air lift him from a field. Michael Taylor (60) from Surrey was a former master of the Surrey Union hunt.

Peter Ketteridge, a member of the Puckeridge Hunt's committee died after a fall following the Hunt's opening meet on 1 November. Mr Ketteridge had been taken to Harlow hospital with head injuries and was later transferred to the Neurological Hospital in London, where he later died.

Geoffrey Fox was the Joint-Master of the Cambridgeshire Foxhounds from 1989-93 and was in office at the time Tom Worby was killed by members of his hunt. He died recently of a brain tumour aged 50.

Sunshine & Shadow - an Autobiography

by (the late) Wilfred Crone

Wilfred Crone was a well-known advocate of the vegan and fruitarian diets. He loved to entertain his guests with stories from his varied past - life in poverty in NE England, emigration to Australia (where he worked on farms in the 1930s) and interesting experiences with animals and humans.

After his death, these were found written down and are presented in this book, together with his idea of Universal Harmony, in the hope that a wider public may enjoy these stories and gain some idea of his warm personality.

This book is available from:

Public opinion on fox-hunting 'being ignored'

By Fran Abrams
Political Correspondent

THE Government ignored public opinion when it refused to find parliamentary time for a Bill to ban hunting, the head of Britain's biggest polling organisation has claimed.

Bob Worcester, chairman of MORI, said only half a per cent of the population had attended the Countryside March in London - protesting against moves to ban fox-hunting - a figure which in polling terms would be considered "statistically insignificant".

"Can the Government ignore that? No, it seems they cannot," he wrote in the latest edition of British Public Opin- ion, a MORI publication. "And what about public opinion as represented by their elected representatives in Parliament, their MPs? They are the lot who stayed in Westminster on a Friday rather than return to their constituencies to give the second cent of people living in or near the countryside supported the Bill, brought by Mr Foster, the Labour MP for Worcester.

The Countryside March had attracted mainly people from the higher social classes, he said - 82 per cent were ABC1 compared with 48 per cent of the electorate. More than half were from the AB professional and managerial classes which represented just 18 per cent of the adult population.

Eight out of 10 marchers had said they would vote Tory in a general election, while just 7 per cent were Labour supporters. They also displayed strong convictions on a number of issues which have recently exercised the Conservatives, with 87 per cent "strongly opposed" to the beef-on-the-bone ban and 48 per cent "strongly opposed" to right-to-roam legislation.

Janet George, chief press officer for the Countryside Alliance, said she did not accept Mr Worcester's poll of the march.

Some observers had claimed MORI's pollsters had interviewed mainly the better-dressed marchers, she said.

Recent polls for the alliance by Research Studies of Great Britain showed that 55 per cent would instruct their MP to vote for a ban on hunting, but only 47 per cent wanted to see it made a criminal offence. While 67 per cent of 16- to 24-year-olds wanted a ban, the figure dropped to 39 per cent in the 55-plus age group.

"I would contend that the vast majority of those people would not cross the road to sign a petition for a ban. People may be against hunting in the way they are against all sorts of things, but they don't care that much," she said.

Badger case is upheld

TWO judges - one who allows fox hunts to cross his land and one who does not - have clarified the law on the extent to which hunters can interfere with badgers' sets.

Lord Justice Rose, sitting with Mr Justice Sullivan in the High Court in London yesterday, ruled that soil could only be used to "stop up" a set and prevent a fox going to ground if it was sufficiently broken so as not to interfere with a badger's ability to use its home.

The two judges rejected an appeal by Richard Lovett, a full-time employee of the Vale of White Horse Hunt, against his conviction for interfering with a badgers' sett in Wiltshire in 1994. He had been fined £100 after using clay soil to stop up two holes.

Both hunt supporters and the RSPCA claimed the ruling as a victory. A spokesman for the RSPCA said it had always been a "matter of common sense."

Hoax bomb threats sent by animal rights group

A DAILY TELEGRAPH 10-2-98

By Daily Telegraph Correspondent

A NEW splinter group of violent animal rights extremists sent out hoax bombs as a warning to 20 targets in Britain yesterday.

The Provisional Animal Liberation Front said it would be launching a genuine campaign of terror within two months.

Anyone working in, or associated with, industries involving animals is liable to be chosen as a target.

The group sent the hoax devices to organisations and individuals plus a list of targets and a statement outlining its aims.

"Unlike some areas of the animal liberation movement, we do not accept that it is wrong to endanger secretaries and others who may be perceived by some as 'innocent'," said the statement.

"We argue that anyone who profits in any way from animal abuse is as guilty as those who actually perpetrate the obscenities. The abusers at the 'sharp end' could not continue in isolation. They shall all pay.

"None who receives rewards from evil deeds shall be exempt from vengeance until they renounce animal torture."

Companies and individuals were sent video cassette boxes containing cat litter and a diagram showing how a real bomb could just as easily have been sent.

Recipients came from areas such as vivisection, meat and fishing industry, pet trade, field sports and live export industry. A zoo and a fur trade company were also targeted.

Packages were also sent to two individuals who appear to have angered the group. Edinburgh's Roslin Institute, which produced Dolly the cloned sheep, was also on the hit list.

Dr Maggie Jennings, who works for the RSPCA's research animal department, received a package. The RSPCA is opposed to experiments on animals but Dr Jennings is described by the group as a "pro-vivisectionist lackey".

The statement said real bombs would be sent next time. "We intend these hoaxes to act as a warning so animal abusers and traitors may have the opportunity to change their ways before our unashamedly violent campaign begins in earnest."

One box was sent to the Dover Harbour Board because the activists claim that it has refused to stop live animal exports.

Robin Webb, Animal Liberation Front press officer, said: "The Front would not condone any action that endangers human life. But at the same time we do understand the frustration that people feel when they see that peaceful protest is not changing things."

Animal rights activists attack scientist

Lucy Patton

AN OXFORD professor was attacked by animal rights activists as he delivered a lecture last night. Colin Blakemore was presenting the 72nd Conway Memorial Lecture to the South Place Ethical Society in London when a bottle was thrown and two women jumped on the stage.

One woman was arrested on suspicion of assault, criminal damage and threatening behaviour after kicking a car door closed on the academic after the lecture.

Prof Blakemore said last night: "I have never been physically attacked like that before. I am willing to talk to any group that has any strong feelings concerning these issues."

Prof Blakemore has been at the forefront of controversy over animal testing, becoming animal activists' main target in 1972 when he revealed he had sewn up kittens' eyes under anaesthetic to study child blindness.

In the past, he has had windows smashed and his three children threatened with kidnapping. In 1993 a bomb packed with needles was sent to his home and last August paint stripper was poured over his car.

However, in October last year, Prof Blakemore said he supported a ban on most testing of cosmetics on animals, and set up the Boyd Group for dialogue between scientists and animal rights activists.

Record sentence for animal rights bomber

By Simon de Brunelles

AN ANIMAL rights bomber who carried out arson attacks on stores across the South of England yesterday, it is believed to be the longest sentence for an animal rights extremist.

Barry Horne, 45, described by the judge as an urban terrorist and by police as "dangerous, ruthless and absolutely committed", caused millions of pounds of damage to shops on the Isle of Wight in 1994.

He used disguises and was not caught until two years later, when detectives acting on a tip-off arrested him as he planted incendiary devices in shops at Bristol. Judge Simon Darwall Smith told Horne yesterday: "This was urban terrorism for a particular cause and objective. You put communities in terror. But I do accept you did not intend an attack on human life."

Last month Horne was found guilty on four charges of arson, five of attempted arson and one of possessing bomb-making equipment. He had earlier admitted two charges of attempted arson and two of possession of articles with intent to damage property.

Horne punched the air in defiance as he was sentenced and cheering animal rights supporters banged on the windows of the public gallery at Bristol Crown Court. The court was told that Horne, who gave an address in Northampton, had previous convictions for similar offences.

After his release from prison on a charge of possessing incendiary bombs, he began planting firebombs in shops at Ryde and Newport on the Isle of Wight. In one night he caused so much damage that the island's emergency services called in reinforcements from the mainland.

His targets included a Boots store in Newport, which was destroyed at an estimated cost of £2.8 million. Other targets included a fishing tackle shop, Halfords and Cancer Research shops, which were badly damaged in simultaneous explosions.

In January 1995, detectives raided Horne's temporary home at Swindon, Wiltshire, where they found an article bragging about terror campaigns carried out by animal rights extremists. The piece, entitled 1994 - Fighting and Winning, said: "What an excellent year 1994 was a year in which we fought back and inflicted losses on animal abusers."

Horne was arrested in July 1996 in Broadmead shopping centre, Bristol, by detectives from the South East Regional Crime Squad, who had been following him for more than a month. He had been seen placing incendiary devices in two stores. When he was searched, four devices were found inside the lining of his jacket. He had put tape around his fingertips to avoid leaving prints.

Detectives found 18 more devices, each using a watch face, battery, theatrical maroon flare and incendiary powder mix stuffed into a cigarette packet. The firebombs were primed and ready to explode. Linda Jones, an explosives expert who gave evidence at the Oklahoma and World Trade Centre bombing trials in the US, told the court that most of the bombs were viable and had been designed by one person, or a small group "working closely together to a common plan".

Horne, who is unemployed, did not give evidence or call witnesses during the seven-day trial. In mitigation, Alistair Edie told the court that he never placed devices near residential properties and that all were timed to go off late at night.

He said: "Mr Horne is not a ruthless and dangerous man. He is not a Mr Big. He is not a Lenin of the animal liberation movement, nor an urban terrorist."

Detective Chief Inspector Roy Lambert, who headed the investigation, said after the case: "Horne is a very dangerous and ruthless man absolutely committed to his cause. We are very pleased at the sentence."

"We believe we have saved Bristol and other cities from horrendous firebombing campaigns. This man was not going to let anything come in his way."

After Horne had been found guilty, the court was told that he had convictions from 1988 to 1995 for offences carried out during his campaign.

DNA used in hunt for killers of badger

By Russell Jenkins

FOUR men accused of killing a badger after digging it from its sett were linked to the crime by DNA tests on the animal's body, a court was told yesterday.

Magistrates in Bakewell, Derbyshire, were told that it was the first time genetic profiling had been relied upon by the RSPCA in such a case. Blood found on one of the men's clothing and on another's knife was matched with tissue taken from a dead badger, it was alleged.

Garry Shaw, 26, of Matlock; Russell Pettipierre, 37, of Alderwastley; David Wragg, 32, of Belper; and Michael Holland, 32, of Chaddesden, all Derbyshire, deny killing and digging for a badger and interfering with a sett at Cromford Moor in Derbyshire.

John Sutcliffe, prosecuting for the RSPCA, said tests showed that bodily fluids or tissue from the dead badger were present on Mr Holland's boiler suit and Mr Wragg's knife.

The trial continues.

Minister: We'll block any bid to ban shooting

ANIMAL rights campaigners have been warned that the Government will block any attempt to introduce a ban on shooting and fishing.

Countryside Minister Elliot Morley last night ruled out a crackdown on game or clay-pigeon shooting.

Field-sports enthusiasts fear a proposed ban on fox hunting could strengthen the campaign to abolish angling and shooting.

But in an interview for next month's issue of the Shooting Gazette, Mr Morley made clear the Government thinks shooting is an 'essential' part of country life.

'My own view as Countryside Minister is that shooting and angling have no difficulty in justifying themselves,' he said.

His attempt to reassure the countryside lobby is another step in Government efforts to reassure those who fear it has put the interest of city-living campaigners first.

A Private Member's Bill to ban hunting with hounds will go before the Commons later this year.

Tony Blair promised a free vote, but earlier this month announced he would back a ban.

Then a mass rally of over 100,000 countryside activists in Hyde Park forced the Government to promise it would not allocate extra Commons time to guarantee the Bill's passage.

EDITORS JAILED FOR CONSPIRACY

By Diane Taylor

Three editors of radical publications have been found guilty of conspiring to incite 'persons unknown' to commit criminal damage. Civil liberties lawyers say the verdicts have huge implications for freedom of speech.

At the end of the 10-week case bought by Hampshire Police, the first of its kind for a decade, Steve Booth, Sax Wood and Noel Molland were jailed for three years each for reporting the actions of green and animal-rights activists in two publications, Green Anarchist and Animal Liberation Front Supporters Group Newsletter.

Co-defendant Simon Russell was acquitted following jury deliberations lasting three and a half days. An appeal has already been launched.

Tim Greene, the defendants' solicitor, said he was disappointed but not surprised: "This result has very severe implications for anyone who wishes to report events in radical or other publications in anything but a condemnatory way. It gives the green light to reactionary police officers to concentrate on this sort of activity."

Threat of more animal rights activist attacks

JULIA HINDE

ANIMAL rights activists turned on the Government this week following attacks on five Oxford academics this month.

Animal Liberation Front protesters demonstrated at Labour party headquarters in London to draw attention to Barry Horne, a remand prisoner in Bristol Prison, who is on a second hunger strike.

Mr Horne, 45, who is charged with possessing explosive devices, claims the Government has reneged on pre-election promises to protect laboratory animals from experimentation.

Robin Webb, spokesman for the ALE which last week claimed responsibility for the recent attacks on Oxford academics including Colin Blakemore, who later this month will succeed as president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, said Mr Horne had stopped his initial hunger strike after written promises from Labour that it would set up a Royal Commission on animal experimentation, but that this had now been dismissed.

Mr Webb said: "There will continue to be demonstrations and other action against other people who are involved in animal experimentation and testing. I can't predict what is going to happen. Certainly anyone who is involved in the use of animals in research and in other areas would be a legitimate target for demonstrations and other actions."

The British Association annual meeting, being held at Leeds University early next month, will include a debate between those at either extreme of the animal rights spectrum, including Professor Blakemore, who has been the focus of attacks for over a decade.

Activists target store chairman

ANIMAL activists descended on the Bledlow home of the chairman of the John Lewis Partnership last week to protest against the company's organised pheasant shoots.

The 15 demonstrators blew whistles, chanted and battered on the doors of the farm belonging to Stuart Hampson on Tuesday night.

The group also claims to have smashed a front window at the house but when the police arrived they found no sign of any damage or protestors.

The attack was said to be part of a campaign to end the shoots, organised for John Lewis employees at the company's Leckford Abbas Estate, near Stockbridge in Hampshire, where the birds are bred.

The Animal Liberation Front denied the group was connected with them, and issued a statement which it claims was sent to its press officer anonymously.

"It would have taken us two minutes to trash the house completely and unless we hear very soon that the shoots are not to continue that is exactly what we'll do," it read.

A spokesman for father-of-two Mr Hampson (51) said it was not company policy to comment on such matters.

Hoax packages have been sent to the estate by a group calling itself the Provisional Animal Liberation Front.

Secret slaughter of eight million animals 'not suitable' for tests

by David Harrison

MILLIONS of animals bred for scientific experiments are being slaughtered because they are 'not quite right' for the tests. Many other 'unsuitable' animals are sold to research centres or to markets in what one MP described as 'a hidden trade in misery'.

Monkeys, horses, dogs, cats, rabbits, guinea pigs, mice and rats are among the animals being rejected by scientists because they are not the right sex, age, weight, or 'quality' for experiments.

The scale of the slaughter in British research centres has outraged animal welfare groups. Animal Aid, Britain's biggest animal charity, described the cull as 'the great secret scandal of animal experiments'.

The figures are based on those given to Liberal Democrat MP Norman Baker by John Chisholm, chief executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (Dera) at Porton Down in Wiltshire, where scientists carry out tests on animals.

They show that two or three times more animals are culled than are used for experiments. Dera says this is 'in line with commercial operation'.

The Home Office admits that 2.7 million animal experiments take place in Britain every year. Mr Baker, MP for Lewes, said: 'If two or three times the number of animals experimented on are being killed then the total number being slaughtered is between five and eight million.'

'These animals are being bred in artificial conditions, never seeing the light of day, and are then killed by lethal injection, gassing or by having their necks broken.'

The MP added that this 'unnecessary slaughter' exposed the shallowness of the government ban on using animals for cosmetics tests, which had cut the number of experiments by only 200 a year.

The Porton Down figures show that 94 Marmoset monkeys were killed and 12 used for experiments between 1994-95. In the nine months to January, 3,167 mice were killed and 923 used for experiments, while 2,504 rats were slaughtered and 724 used for tests.

The Home Office admitted that it kept no record of the number of animals killed in research establishments other than Porton Down because no licence is required to kill 'surplus' animals.

Andrew Tyler, director of Animal Aid, said: 'The least these animals deserve is to turn up in official statistics, but they are denied even that.'

The British Anti-Vivisection Society said its own investigations had shown 'horrendous' numbers of animals were killed because they were unsuitable for tests.

Anti-Hirst protest caused mayhem

BY JOANNA BALE

FIVE animal welfare activists barged into a London restaurant to protest at an exhibition of pickled cows' heads by the artist Damien Hirst, a court was told yesterday.

They scuffled with staff at Quo Vadis, a Soho restaurant owned by Hirst and the chef Marco Pierre White, in January as customers dined near the exhibits — glass cases containing two bull's heads in formaldehyde. The protesters kicked a painting, broke a vase, ripped telephones from their sockets and tipped rubbish on the floor. They were eventually thrown out of the restaurant, which exhibits work by young British artists.

In the dock at Middlesex Guildhall Crown Court were Melanie Gatty, Paul Gravette, and Brendon McNally, of north London; Niel Hansen, of Hertfordshire; and Robin Lane, of southeast London.

Brendan Kelly, for the prosecution, said that he would accept not guilty pleas to affray from Gatty and Gravette. He read out a list of previous convictions against the other three, many linked to animal welfare activities.

Gatty and Gravette were each bound over by Judge David Paget, QC, in the sum of £100 to keep the peace for a year. The other three, who admitted using threatening words and behaviour but denied affray, were fined £200, ordered to pay costs and bound over in the same terms.

The number of animals used in military experiments is expected to soar following the Government's announcement last year of a £2.5 million research programme into the effects of vaccines and tablets given during the Gulf war.

But a United States Defence Department statement said recent tests on animals had failed to explain symptoms suffered by American troops in the war.

'I'll not give in' says farmer after bomb threat

A CAT farmer whose business is at the centre of regular demonstrations has revealed that animal rights protesters have threatened to bomb his home.

Mr Chris Brown, who breeds virus-free cats for animal research, is one of a number of businessmen who have received bomb threats from the Provisional Animal Liberation Front.

The farmer, who is in his late 50s, suffered burns to his face and stomach when a letter-bomb exploded at his cat-breeding farm in Minster Lovell, near Witney, in 1993.

The latest package sent to his home contained a video cassette box with cat litter and a diagram of the internal workings of an explosive device. There was a warning that next time the bomb would be a real one.

He handed the package to police who are making inquiries.

The Provisional ALF which sent the hoax device declared a policy of committing acts of violence against its targets earlier this month.

Mr Brown said he refused to be intimidated. He continued: "Last time I opened one of these packages, it exploded and burned my eyebrows, face and stomach.

"My concern is that even though these packages are addressed to me, another member of my family might open it. What is happening is frightening but I don't intend to give in."

Acting Supt Dan Clacher, the head of Operation Stile, established earlier this year to monitor protests at Hillgrove Farm, said: "This is yet another example of threats and intimidation against Mr Brown. An investigation is now under way."

■ Bleach poured on to meat in protest against exotic food.

By Jonathan Smith and Lorna Shearman
The News

Nine animal rights activists who poured bleach on to meat in Sainsbury's supermarket at Fareham were arrested by police after staff evicted them from the store.

About 15 demonstrators who were spotted damaging the meat in the store at about 8pm last night claimed they were protesting against the importation of exotic meats.

Sainsbury's today condemned their actions and said the store in Broadcut did not even stock exotic meats like kangaroo, crocodile and ostrich.

As well as contaminating the meat with suspected bleach, the activists also pushed children's lollipops into packs of beef and lamb before Sainsbury's security staff ejected the protesters.

A man claiming to represent the demonstrators telephoned had targeted Sainsbury's because of its stance on importing exotic meats from abroad.

"We're opposed to it because of the extra stress caused to animals. There's so much meat available we feel there is no need to import things like kangaroos which are already under pressure in Australia.

"Asda, the Co-op and Safeways agreed with us from the beginning and Tesco's are coming round to our way of thinking. But Sainsbury's wrote to us saying that so long as there was customer demand for the meat they would carry on selling it."

Kelly Flynn, a spokeswoman for Sainsbury's said the protesters were "irresponsible".

"It upsets our customers and they do not tend to get any sympathy from the public."

She said there was no connection between the attacks and the so-called Mardis Gras bombers who have targeted Sainsbury's stores in London with incendiary devices.

The nine suspects were held in custody over night at Fareham police station and were due to be questioned later today.

Animal tests to go on ANIMAL experiments to test new cosmetics are to continue despite pledges to ban them made by Tony Blair during the general election, writes Jason Bennetto.

Labour has also reneged on promises - contained in an official policy document - to set up a Royal Commission into the issue and to reduce the number of animals used. Government funding of research into alternatives to animal testing is being cut by £60,000 to £197,000 next year.

The Home Office, however, is to increase the number of inspectors used to check laboratories and breeding farms, and to introduce a tougher code of practice with better training for animal workers. Any site using animals will have to give details of what alternatives it has considered.

News that Labour has gone back on its promise to act on animal testing has dismayed antivivisection campaigners.

About 2,800 animals, mostly rabbits, guinea pigs and rats, were used last year to test cosmetics for problems such as irritation or effects on the reproductive system. The vast bulk of animals - 2.7 million last year - are used for medical research, pharmaceuticals, and testing military defensive equipment.

She had written: "They cut the throats of women and children, our monks, our officials; they will cut our throats one day."

Judgment was reserved until January 20. (AFP)

Builders badgered to a halt by shy residents

By Marcus Binney

ALL seemed lost for heritage campaigners trying to save a Georgian estate. Then, just as builders began to rip out hedges and iron railings to make way for executive homes, the badgers came to the rescue.

The grounds of Downe Hall in Bridport, Dorset, are a haven of badger setts and, as naturalists pointed out, damaging or interfering with the sett or disturbing a badger carries fines of up to £5,000 or six months in prison. Work has been halted.

ANIMAL rights campaigners are believed to have planted an incendiary bomb which damaged a Wanstead butchers shop.

The front window of AG Dennis's shop in the High Street was left with a foot long spider's web-like fracture. The whole window was replaced on Tuesday.

PC Paul Mitchell said the cause of the damage was an incendiary device, which caused minimal damage to the window between 12.30 and 1am early on Friday. The Bomb Squad had been called to investigate.

By David Griffiths

Although PC Mitchell could not confirm if it was the work of animal rights campaigners, a spokesman for the Animal Liberation Front is certain that his members taped the device to the window.

Robin Webb, press officer for the Animal Liberation Front (ALF), said his organisation had not claimed responsibility, but added: "I am confident that ALF activists did this. That would be in line with the Animal Liberation Front."

Devices had also been strapped to butcher shop windows in Collier Row, near Chigwell, in December 1996 and East Ham in February. Mr Webb said he was confident that activists had been responsible for these incidents.

The devices were fixed when the shops were empty so no life was endangered, he added.

"The aim is economic sabotage - to drive the meat industry out of business. When one butcher's shop is damaged, they not only have the cost of replacing the window, they pay an increase in insurance premiums and additional costs in security, such as closed circuit TV cameras," he said.

The meat industry was targeted because it was the biggest area of animal abuse, he claimed.

And he said high street butchers were being hit rather than supermarkets because they sold only meat.

But when asked if people should be allowed to eat meat if they wanted, he said: "There is the argument that you should do something because you enjoy it, but child pornography and dog-fighting are enjoyed by some people. The fact that they enjoy something does not make it morally right."

The boss of Dennis's Butcher's, who did not want to be named, said it was the first time such a device had been attached to his window, although he was aware of similar incidents at other butcher's shops.

The remains of the device had gone by the time he arrived at the shop at 6am.

● Three London area anarchists have been jailed for three years after being found guilty of inciting readers of a magazine to smash the windows of butchers' shops and send letter bombs.

A fourth defendant, said to be associated with the Animal Liberation Front, was acquitted.

Hunting ban Bill runs out of time

By Colin Brown
Chief Political Correspondent

JACK STRAW, the Home Secretary, is under pressure to announce an inquiry into blood sports to head off the Labour MPs' demands for a ban on fox-hunting after a Private Member's Bill yesterday looked doomed to a lingering death.

After last Sunday's mass march on London by the countryside lobby, dominated by the hunting, shooting and fishing fraternity, the Bill to ban fox-hunting was slowly dispatched with a whimper.

The anti-hunting campaign managed a token protest of 12 bedraggled people, with four banners, in the rain outside the Commons.

The Tory old guard who led the assault on the Bill were nearly tripped up by new technology. Michael Heseltine, who led the charge, was in full flow during his speech, when his mobile telephone went off in contravention of a ruling by the Speaker, Betty Boothroyd. Mr Heseltine, a former minister in charge of technology, fumbled with the instrument before carrying on. Supporters of the Bill tried to force the pace by halting a debate on one amendment with a closure vote.

The opera hat - needed to make a point of order during a division - was passed around during the vote as the supporters of the Bill cried foul over the slowness of their opponents.

The Serjeant at Arms was dispatched to investigate, but it was clear that the number of amendments would leave the Bill too little parliamentary time, and it will get the coupe de grace next Friday.

Tony Blair, who was in Scotland, told MPs last year that Labour's election manifesto commitment to allow a free vote had been fulfilled. But the size of the record 260-vote majority on the Bill's second reading last November was a warning that the demands will not go away.

A cross-party group of MPs, including the Labour MP Kate Hoey, who are seeking a "middle way" out of the foxhunting row, last night led calls for an independent inquiry to allow a compromise to be reached.

An inquiry has not been ruled out by Michael Foster, the Labour MP who introduced the Bill. Supporters of the ban fear an inquiry will be used to put the issue off until after the next election, but it may keep alive their hopes. They were furious with Mr Straw for saying the Government had no mandate for a ban. Former Labour frontbencher, Kevin McNamara said: "There will be many Labour supporters... who will see this as a sheer shift of ground from 'no time this session' to 'no time ever'".

Mr Straw is anxious to avoid the Government's Crime and Disorder Bill being targeted in the autumn by anti-hunting MPs to outlaw foxhunting.

Government sources confirmed that Home Office officials were studying an inquiry among the options for dealing with public concern about blood sports.

Ms Hoey said: "Today's debate strengthened the case for an independent inquiry because so many new things were coming out."

Masked saboteurs hit hunters with bats

Thirty-one people were arrested and three others taken to hospital yesterday after animal rights activists clashed with supporters of the Hursley and Hambledon Hunt at Warnford near Bishops Waltham, Hampshire.

The masked saboteurs attacked the hunters' cars, smashing windows and damaging bodywork. Three hunt supporters were injured while trying to protect the vehicles.

Jeffrey Mansfield, 51, said: "About seven or eight Transit vans containing as many as 100 people turned up and the thugs spilled out of them. They started shouting and smashing up the cars which were parked on the verges."

"They were using clubs, staves and iron bars, and they attacked anybody who offered any resistance or who tried to defend themselves or their vehicle. It was very violent and very frightening."

Hunt Saboteurs Association spokesman Paul Gammon said he was appalled by news of the violent clashes, which were "utterly out of character from our usual type of actions".

RSPCA hit by terror scare list

by Siobhan Ryan

SECURITY has been stepped up at the Horsham-based RSPCA after threats from an animal rights group.

The move comes after the discovery of an Animal Liberation Front hit list which targets some of the charity's senior staff.

The list was compiled after the RSPCA dropped one of its policy statements which declares support for animal rights.

The society had been warned by the Charity Commission it risked losing its charitable status unless its commitment to the policy was dropped.

Under guidelines, the RSPCA is supposed to seek the prevention of cruelty to animals using a non-violent approach.

But the commission said the RSPCA's animal rights policy statement connected it too closely with terrorist groups like the ALF.

A spokesman for the charity confirmed it had received threats from the ALF and two hoax parcel bombs had been intercepted.

Animal rights attack on store warehouse

AN animal rights group this week claimed responsibility for a vandalism attack which caused hundreds of pounds of damage at a Stevenage warehouse.

The Animal Liberation Front (ALF) said it targeted the John Lewis depot, in Cavendish Road, Symonds Green, pouring paint over lorries and smashing windows.

Stevenage police said the break-in took place between 4pm on Saturday and 9.30am on Sunday.

Animal protest targets West lab

ANIMAL rights protestors yesterday vowed to close down a West laboratory in their war against vivisection.

The Animal Liberation Front said it would not rest until the Quintiles laboratory in Herefordshire was shut down.

The statement follows the ALF's success in targeting the Consort beagle breeding kennels in nearby Ross-on-Wye in September. Until they closed the kennels used to breed beagle pups for medical research.

Yesterday ALF spokesman Robin Webb said: "The recent closure of Consort points to the success of the ALF's activities, and it would be a sensible course of action by the ALF to target a similar sort of establishment."

About 70 protestors demonstrated outside the Quintiles laboratory on Sunday and police, wearing protective riot clothing, made seven arrests for public order offences. All have been charged and bailed on condition to stay at least one mile from the laboratory.

A spokesman for Quintiles said they played a crucial research role in developing new drugs to help treat conditions such as cancer, heart disease, migraine and Alzheimer's disease.

"If we allowed this, or any other protest, to halt our research then it could cause suffering for all those people who are relying on us to help develop a cure."

Farmers admit killing deer

TWO prominent hunt leaders yesterday admitted shooting 100 red deer on the Quantock Hills since the National Trust banned hunting with hounds. They claim the hunt can no longer control the number of wild deer on their farms, but outraged hunt opponents accused them of emotional blackmail, claiming they had blown apart a deal setting a deer culling quota.

One scientist warned that red deer could disappear from parts of Exmoor and the Quantocks if shooting continued at such a rate. The National Trust and Forestry Commission insisted there would be no U-turn over their ban.

Robert Rowe and Ben Bartlett, of the Quantock Stag hounds, are both farmers and active hunt supporters.

They revealed their cull at a meeting of the Exmoor Deer Management and Conservation Group, but would not disclose how much they made selling the carcasses, though they are said to be worth up to £100 each.

Other landowners condemned the two, while anti-hunt campaigners called for an end to all hunting and shooting. Farmer Michael Fry, a neighbour of Mr Bartlett, said: "These are people who profess to love deer. This is barbaric, pure greed."

Hunt protesters fear 'kill' threats

Report by Michael Butler

HUNT protesters fear for their lives, claiming they have received death threats from hostile fox-hunters.

The county's most prominent hunt protest group, South Dorset Hunt Saboteurs Association, says its members are being threatened in their own homes by hunt supporters and are calling for police protection.

Dorset Police confirmed yesterday that they are investigating the claims.

"We've had thugs come to people's homes in Dorchester and Blandford issuing death threats and we're terrified.

We've seen these people at hunts and know they're violent," said a saboteur, who refused to be named for fear of reprisals.

One protester claimed he was threatened on Saturday in the centre of Dorchester as he dropped his wife off at work.

"Two hunters stopped their car and said they were going to kill me," he said.

Another said he had to leave his job in East Knighton after being threatened by two car loads of hunters with guns and dogs.

The saboteurs have blamed the recent anti-hunting Bill which has divided rural communities. Last month some of the worst violence in the country was at Dorset hunts.

"The hunters have known they're fighting a losing battle and it looks like a small minority are now intent on intimidating us in our homes, where we work and in our neighbourhoods. We know who they are and the police do also," said one saboteur.

Det Sgt Bob Lee of Dorset Police said: "Violence surrounding the hunts has entered a new phase during past months and police have been notified of several incidents," he said.

But the death threats have been played down by hunt representatives.

"We've heard nothing of these accusations and would never support this kind of action," said Alison Hawes, spokesman for British Field Sports Dorset, who claimed the allegations were a publicity stunt.

Grim circus routine of animal beatings

CIRCUS animals are being routinely beaten, whipped and clubbed by trainers, according to a report yesterday by animal rights campaigners.

The 18-month study into the use of circus animals by a group called Animal Defenders involved studying the animals, and working practices in winter quarters and travelling circuses.

The report, called The Ugliest Show on Earth, also drew on 400 hours of videotape which included scenes of beatings and long confinements.

One piece of footage featured an elephant being beaten relentlessly with an iron bar.

In another, an infant chimpanzee, 18 months old, is seen being kicked and whipped.

The report claimed that animals were frequently left locked up for long periods on time.

The study said one elephant spent 98 per cent of her time chained in a lorry or tent. Large cats were found to spend 75-80 per cent of their time in cages while horses were locked in their stables for 23 hours a day.

Animal Defenders director Jan Creamer said: "In over 20 years of studying the use of animals and campaigning for animal protection, this is the most appalling abuse I have ever seen."

"Elephants were beaten with pitchforks, shovels, elephant hooks and anything else to hand — on one occasion the animal was brought to the ground screaming.

"It is time that the use of animals in circuses was abandoned and performing animal training centres brought under the Zoo Licensing Act."

In the absence of a ban on the use of animals in the circus trade, Animal Defenders is calling for zoo animals to be protected under the 1981 act which regulates standards of animal welfare in zoos and safari parks.

'Elephants were beaten with pitchforks, shovels and anything else to hand'

But a spokesman for the Chipperfield circus family said its animals are all seen regularly by veterinary surgeons.

He said: "The companies all employ experienced veterinary surgeons who advise them. Where appropriate the local authority issues licenses for the premises and in order to get a licence they have to be inspected each year."

"Where animals are in quarantine they have to be visited every week by a ministry approved vet."

Tiger attacks circus man

Chipperfield family employee loses arm feeding big cats

Lucy Patton

A LION tamer employed by the Chipperfield Circus family was last night recovering in hospital after his arm was bitten off and swallowed by a tiger.

The 32-year-old man, who has not been named, was helped to safety by police and paramedics after the tiger sunk its teeth into his arm, severing it just below the elbow.

The accident happened inside a compound at the circus's winter quarters at Chip-ping Norton, Oxfordshire. Emergency services stabilised the man at the scene before he was airlifted to the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford. His condition was not known last night.

A spokesman for Oxfordshire ambulance trust said: "I can confirm that we have a victim whose arm has been bitten off by a tiger, just below the elbow. We understand that it has been swallowed by the tiger."

It was revealed later that the man had been feeding the tiger from outside the cage when it lunged for his arm and chewed it off.

Staff at the quarters usually use a long stick to put food into the cages, but it was believed that the victim had put his arm into the cage.

A spokesman for Thames Valley police said: "He suffered extensive injuries to his left hand and lower arm. The tiger was in its cage when the incident happened."

Some of the animals at the Chipperfield site are circus animals in winter quarters, while others there are used for television, film and advertising work.

The Chipperfield family, one of the oldest circus families in Britain, has already suffered a tragedy this year.

Last month Richard Chipperfield, a 24-year-old trainer, was mauled by a tiger during a photo shoot in Florida. He had his head in the tiger's mouth when it slammed its jaws shut.

He lost part of his brain in the accident and doctors have said he will probably be paralysed if he recovers consciousness.

His brother Graham, aged 28, later shot the Bengal tiger.

Save the Hillgrove Cats

The Hillgrove Campaign is growing in strength and gathering momentum. Since last summer the national demonstrations have increased in numbers with over a thousand people at the one on 22nd February 1998 and many more on World Day For Laboratory Animals on 18th April 1998.

Christopher Brown has been breeding cats for vivisection for the last 27 years. He has over 1,000 cats and kittens all kept in windowless sheds. Brown and two Hillgrove workers - Susan O'Shea and Helen Ramsay all maintain they "don't know" where the cats end up when they are sold!! Funnily enough we don't believe them. They only have to ask us! We'll tell them. As a result of the constant publicity, demonstrations at the farm and home visits, most of the workers have left. There were eleven workers originally. Now there are only three. Brown has had to resort to employing workers from an agency.

Hillgrove Farm has appeared on national television, radio and newspapers and is constantly in ALL the local papers. We put a lot of effort into publicity and now mailout to over 2,500 people. As we all know, publicly exposing an animal abuser is one of our most powerful weapons. They DON'T LIKE IT! A lot of locals are now opposed to Hillgrove Farm. MPs, local councillors, shopkeepers and newspapers are all turning on Mr Brown.

The whole situation isn't just about Brown anymore. As far as the establishment and the vivisection industry are concerned we MUST NOT WIN. They must be panicking after seeing Consort Bioservices destroyed and Copley Kennels nipped in the bud and prevented from even starting their filthy trade. They know deep down that even though the majority of the public don't do a lot, many of them are backing us all the way, and these massive national campaigns are educational and expose the horrors of the laboratories and the fraud of vivisection.

Brian Shiel, Nicola Maddocks and Kevin Hickey appeared at Oxford Crown Court in March and were all found not guilty of burglary after a raid at Hillgrove Farm on 18th January 1997 where cats were rescued. The police must be panicking. The jury were clearly sympathetic to the campaign, which is why it is in the police's interest to keep the charges down to magistrates level.

The judge was furious with the verdicts and claimed he would have given the acquitted defendants 2 years in prison had they been found guilty! The judge vented his anger on Kevin Hickey with a savage 12 month sentence for handling stolen goods (he refused to hand over a cat to a police officer). Sickening when you look at what badger baiters get.

As a result of the facts that emerged during the trial we have decided to take legal advice on taking out a private prosecution against Brown under the Protection of Animals Act, 1911. We learned that Brown loses 10% of new-born kittens to cannibalism by their own mothers (a sign of extreme stress). Breeding queens are continuously bred from until they are 10 years old and then they are 'culled' - the cat that Kevin Hickey had in his arms had no tattoo in her ear and was killed two weeks before the trial. Brown said, "there is nothing sinister about Margaret being culled, she had come to the end of her breeding life".

We know the campaign is having a very damaging effect when the Research Defence Society devote nearly two whole pages to Hillgrove and the animal rights movement.

This campaign WILL win! It MUST win!

We need people to support the national demonstrations, all night vigils and daily demos. Please contact us if you can take on one day a week or even once a month! There are demos every day at Hillgrove Farm and one particular worker takes great delight in laughing at the banners and waving at protestors!! The others aren't anywhere near as confident!

There is a demo every Sunday morning from 7.30am at Dry Lane, Witney, Oxon.

Please phone if you can help in anyway or would like leaflets, newsletters, a video, etc.

DOGS IN NEPAL

by Victor Schwanberg

When I was in Nepal in March/April 1997 I was appalled by the sheer number of stray dogs wandering about, many of them crippled and a great number of them were generally ill. During my feeble attempts with fellow friends and travellers to help some of the dogs, we were horrified to learn that the Nepalise authorities encouraged the population to beat to death or poison these creatures.

Apparently there are certain days of the year when dogs are killed to keep the stray population down. I have heard rumours that there are even financial rewards which depend on the number of dogs killed. 1998 is a special year for tourism in which an even greater purge will be made to keep the dog numbers down. I was hoping to return to Nepal in March to gather more information but unfortunately I have had to cancel this trip.

I hope this information may be of use and I would be happy to answer any queries regarding this terrible abuse of animals.

My telephone number, should you wish to contact me, is 0181 878 5679.

RAINBOW'S DREAM

Our opponents are not, despite the strength of your convictions to the contrary, each other. No, all of us, the entire human race, and by extension all that lives, indeed all that is, are kin, facing together the same opponents. Whether or not we realise it, this is the truth.

These opponents are anger, fear, hatred, greed, guilt, by which and because of which we cause such negative emotions. All violence has its roots here. We cannot end suffering or abuse through generating more anger, more fear, more hatred, either in ourselves or in each other. It is an impossibility. Indeed, to generate negativity within ourselves is to increase it in those others in the world around us. Nothing happens in isolation. The rules must apply to all, or to none.

Victory as Tesco Withdraws 'Exotic' Meats

The Tesco supermarket chain has agreed to stop selling kangaroo and ostrich meat in all its 350 stores. The general public's reaction to the brutality involved in the trade, exposed by the campaigning group VIVA!, has been one of widespread shock and disgust.

The campaign against ostrich meat had been running for several months, but that against kangaroo meat had only just been added.

Asda do not stock exotic meats as they say there is no demand, and Safeway, the Co-Op and Marks & Spencer refuse to stock them for animal welfare reasons. However, Waitrose has been trialling ostrich meat in 26 of its stores, while Sainsbury seems to have no qualms whatsoever about selling exotic meats. Somerfield, another major store, were poised to add exotic meats to their food range which was to include kangaroo, ostrich and crocodile but decided to drop the idea after hearing about VIVA!'s campaign and Tesco's decision. This will affect all 590 stores trading under the names Gateway, Solo and Food Giant as well as Somerfield.

Therefore, let us put aside our creeds of coercion, bullying, force, guilt-tripping, intimidation and violence, on whatever levels we are using or supporting them. Let us leave them behind us and show an example by which others, we might pray, can see that there is a better way than the bloody road we have walked for so long.

It is no use trying to push through the gates to Paradise those who most fear to go. They will only resist more strongly. We must lead them - show them there is nothing to fear. Show them, indeed, that the utopia we all long for somewhere deep within our hearts is an achievable reality.

The Campaign Against John Lewis Partnership

For anyone who is not familiar with the NAHC's campaign against the John Lewis Partnership, let me explain how it came about and how it has unfolded into what must be the biggest headache in the Partnership's history!

Back in the summer of 1996, an employee at John Lewis's Leckford Abbas Estate in Stockbridge, Hampshire, contacted the NAHC and told us about shoots organised for the entertainment of John Lewis staff. The shoots, which take place up to three times a week, claim the lives of some 8,000 birds including pheasants, partridge and ducks. The shooters, often quite drunk, also blast away at pigeons, squirrels and, in the words of our informant, "anything else that moves."

After some months of discussions between NAHC and JLP, aimed at given them the opportunity to stop the shoots before we organised a campaign against them, it became clear that they had no intention of taking that easy way out, so the campaign began.

The launch was spectacular, with journalists brought along to witness some 30 activists descend on Leckford with the intention of using non-violent methods to prevent that afternoon's shoot from taking place. In the event, we managed to blockade the convoy of shooter's vehicles en route to the killing field, and prevented them from moving until it was too late for them to shoot.

A series of protests then began outside John Lewis stores (which includes Waitrose) up and down the country. The JLP panicked and made their first big mistake. They issued a writ for libel against the NAHC. The NAHC teamed up with the McLibel Two, the McLibel Support Campaign, McSpotlight and London Greenpeace, who issued a joint leaflet defending the right to free speech and pledging to fight the case. Nation-wide publicity followed and, fearing a McLibel trial Mark 2, within six weeks the Partnership had dropped the case and an application for an injunction against us.

The next few months saw scores of protests outside, inside and on top of John Lewis stores. Slogans were painted on the windows of the Newcastle store and pressure grew on the management from its own employees to abandon the shoots. Increasingly desperate staff resorted to violence against protesters, culminating in the arrest of two Peterborough security guards for assault. The partnership now faces at least two civil cases for assault and one for wrongful arrest and false imprisonment.

On January 28, 1997, 45 campaigners once again arrived at Leckford Abbas. This time the meeting was planned for early morning in the hope that we might be able to prevent both the morning and afternoon shoots from taking place. The plans had been kept quiet, nothing arranged over the phone or through the post. Didn't want the police to turn out and protect the shooters.

We arrived early to give us time to find the place. It was easy enough to find. In fact it stood out like a sore thumb. It was that place underneath the police spotter plane, next to the police riot vans, the police cars, the police motorbikes and the dozens of police officers manning the road blocks and searching everyone in sight.

Not the best of starts, perhaps, but things soon looked up. John Lewis abandoned the morning shoot. We came back after lunch. The shooters didn't bother; the afternoon shoot was cancelled too. Two private shoots on nearby farms hadn't taken the hint and were killing, but soon packed up after the arrival of protesters.

With the time having arrived for John Lewis to decide whether or not to breed pheasants for another season's shooting, the campaign was stepped up with two Weeks of Action during February. The first Week of Action started positively, when the ALF broke into the main John Lewis distribution depot in Stevenage and caused an estimated £20,000 damage to 12 vehicles and offices, smashing windows, applying paint stripper and painting not-very-subtle slogans.

Just days later the NAHC office was raided along with the home of an NAHC member who was arrested but released later without charge. Huge quantities of files, computers, a phone and other equipment were seized and have not yet been returned, despite no charges being brought - blatant harassment.

Numerous protests were held during this first week, including several up to 20 strong against their flagship Oxford Street store and daily protests at the Newcastle store. Three demos took place outside the London homes of John Lewis directors and neighbours were leafleted. Demos have been held outside their London headquarters - during one, two protesters were searched "on suspicion of possession of acid-filled eggs!" Readers may not be surprised to hear that no acid-filled eggs were found.

A statement was issued by a group of 15 activists who visited the home of the chairman, Stuart Hampson, in Chinnor, Bucks. According to the statement, they chanted, blew whistles, banged on his door and then removed his front window. They would be back, they said, to "trash" the house if the shoots weren't stopped soon.

The NAHC is sure that it is pure coincidence that its office was burgled days later and £1000 worth of merchandise stolen. This despite the fact that all the neighbouring offices had equipment of much higher value and of much more use to your average burglar. Fortunately, the burglars were disturbed and were forced to abandon another £1000 worth which they were trying to load into their car. This burglary has hit the NAHC hard as we have to replace stocks at a time when we really can't afford to do so, so any donations would be hugely appreciated!

Meanwhile, the Leckford Abbas estate was one of 20 targets for the new 'Provisional Animal Liberation Front' who sent them a hoax bomb. At least two department stores and their Head Office have fallen victim to hoax bombers, while the Waitrose store in Holloway seems to be keeping the local glazier in business single handed!

Other anti-JLP actions during and since the Weeks of Action would be too numerous to list comprehensively, but highlights include a 'protest picnic' in Cambridge, utilising the display tables and chairs in the furniture department, which was broken up by 19 cops. A 'sleep-in' at the Newcastle store followed, during which 10 or so protesters, too lazy to do a conventional sit-in, arrived in their night-clothes with teddies and hot water bottles and made themselves at home in the display beds. They livened up the next week and occupied the keep-fit section with an 'exercise your right to protest' demo.

Hundreds of John Lewis shareholders have been sent NAHC information packs coupled with a request for them to exercise any influence they can to ensure the shoots are stopped.

In March, an inspection of the shooting estate was carried out and it was discovered that breeding for another season's shooting has started. As the campaigners were walking through woodland surrounding the pheasants, one of them realised that, try as he might, he couldn't move his foot. It was trapped in a snare. Of course, this serves as a reminder that birds are not the only ones to suffer on shooting estates such as this. A gamekeeper will ruthlessly massacre any creature which he perceives as a threat to 'his' birds. John Lewis had denied using snares, so the media were called in, as were the police, who are investigating the legality of the snare.

Just as JLP were recovering from this embarrassment, Newcastle started again. At 8.30 in the morning of March 27, a car pulled up outside the John Lewis lorry park - right across the one and only entrance! Bemused staff could only watch as campaigners clambered on top of the car with an anti-shoot banner, while the two occupants D-locked themselves, by the neck, to the steering unit and to the rear of the car.

The media were called and in next to no time events were being recorded by BBC and Tyne Tees TV film crews plus the Press Association, not to mention the campaigners and JLP themselves, and photographed by the local papers. Radio and TV news bulletins reported the protests throughout the day and huge features appeared in the press. It took the police a full six and a half hours to arrest the two locked-on women, plus a nearby banner waver, for obstruction. The locks were so good that cops (who took the whole demo in good humour, unlike JLP) had to resort to sawing off the steering unit and take one protestor to the station still with the steering wheel around her neck!

The effect was incredible. Shoppers didn't get their deliveries and stocks ran low. Staff had to be paid overtime when the protest ended to clear the backlog of work. Queues of JLP lorries had been held up for hours, and contractors had been turned away. Local groups should note that most, if not all, John Lewis department stores will have lorry parks ... !

This campaign is important and this campaign is winnable. It might be just one of thousands of organised shoots across the country, but nevertheless 8,000 lives each year are at stake. A successful campaign against the JLP shoot will also discourage other companies offering bloodsports-based corporate entertainment.

Please support this campaign in whatever way you feel appropriate. Sources within the company inform us that the two things they hate most are acts of civil disobedience and publicity ... !

The NAHC has produced a new 'John Lewis Boycott Pledge' for use on stalls or demos, in addition to leaflets, postcards, stickers and posters.

GREEK ANIMAL RESCUE

WHEN AND WHY GREEK ANIMAL RESCUE WAS FOUNDED...

It all began with a holiday in Greece in 1987; the first proper holiday in 15 years for my husband Paul and myself and one we both very much looked forward to. Alas, before long our dream holiday turned into a nightmare.

We drove to Greece and intended travelling around for one month before returning home, but as we crossed the border, we encountered the first stray, not realising at the time that he was just one of the many we were to see during our so called holiday.

We spent ten days of our holiday on Crete and that's where we witnessed the most appalling neglect of animals. We saw dozens of hungry strays dogs and cats, not to mention numerous dead ones, lying by the roadside. Many dogs which appeared to belong to someone, were kept chained, their home often just a rusty tin drum. We also saw donkeys and mules left tied in barren fields, with no food or water in sight and many were hobbled, which is a very cruel practice.

We were horrified by all the terrible sights, but what was worse, we were unable to help the poor animals, or at least we didn't know how we could help them - nobody seemed interested in our complaints and we were even laughed at.

The last few days of our holiday found us helping at an animal shelter near Athens and it was there we met Niko Leventakis, who subsequently took me see the Markopoulo shelter, which was at the time struggling to keep going. I was nevertheless impressed at how well the animals looked (mainly dogs) and that most of the females had been spayed which, I later learned, was not the practice at every animal shelter in Greece. That was something I could never understand - what was the point of bringing into this world even more unwanted dogs and cats, when most would either die in the first few months of their life from the various diseases which can afflict them (Parvovirus and Distemper in dogs and cat flu in cats are rife in Greece) and if they were lucky enough not to contract them, their chances of ever being rehoused were very slim. The shelters should be there to help and to provide a sanctuary for the neediest cases - the starved, sick and injured animals, but unfortunately they also become a dumping ground for unwanted litters of puppies and kittens and for older dogs, who have been replaced by their younger counterparts.

Greece is a beautiful country and there is no doubt many of the islands are unique in their structure like, for example, Santorini, but when I visited the island in 1989 (to rescue an abandoned mule), the picturesque scenery is the last thing I noticed. As soon as I got off the ferry, I saw the first of many beasts of burden ... donkeys and mules, struggling up 230 steep winding steps, with tourists and their luggage on their backs. Some were frothing at the mouth, clearly exhausted ... how pitiful they looked!

Although we have been raising funds to help animals in Greece since returning from that fateful holiday in 1987, it was not until October 1989 that GAR obtained charity status.

The sights I witness during my annual visits to Greece are far removed from the pictures portrayed in the holiday brochures and an increasing number of tourists vow never to return, precisely because of the Greek people's indifference to the animals' plight. Every year we receive dozens of letters and phone calls from people who have returned from their holiday in Greece, distressed and unable to erase the tragic memories of hungry and sick strays, often deliberately abused and neglected ... they were doomed from the moment they were born!

Greece's reputation of having the worst animal welfare record in EU is nothing to be proud of and the Greek authorities are as much to blame for this as the general public. Whilst cruelty to animals is a punishable offence, prosecutions are rare and usually unsuccessful. It is against the law to deliberately poison animals, yet thousands of stray dogs and cats (and some belonging to people) die an agonising death from a concoction of farm pesticides, against which there is no antidote. The poisoning is often carried out by municipal workers, on orders given by the local authorities.

How many more tourists will spend their holiday in tears next year, whilst they feed and nurse stray dogs and cats, only to leave them to their hopeless fate at the end of two weeks - for them, Greece will lose its appeal and the memories they will come home with won't be those of the sun, sea and beautiful scenery ...

The number of animals on the streets can only be reduced by spaying and neutering as many as possible, but as the strays don't belong to anybody, nobody wants to take responsibility for their welfare. But how do stray dogs and cats become strays in the first place? They say that a dog is man's best friend ... if only it could be the other way around!

I hope to see the day when animals in Greece are treated with the respect they deserve, when poisoning, shooting and drowning of strays will no longer be an everyday practice, when the children will be taught to love animals, who have so much to offer, not least their loyal friendship and trust.

HOW GAR HELPS ANIMALS IN GREECE...

■ GAR almost entirely funds a rescue shelter in Markopoulo (near Athens), which cares for over two hundred animals, mainly dogs and cats. Several donkeys and mules have also been given refuge in the past and even a monkey.

- Supports animal shelters on Kos and Crete (Chania).
- Promotes and undertakes neutering of dogs and cats, to alleviate the misery of thousands of unwanted litters.
- Actively campaigns against all animal abuse; eg. in zoos, pet shops, circuses, and abattoirs.
- Educates by example, where ignorance is often the cause of needless suffering.

No call for help is ever refused.
The shelter is often the last hope for an injured, abandoned or ill-treated animal.

GAR's aims for the future are manifold, but rescue work will always remain a priority. However, whilst compassion is not lacking, funds are.

GAR aims to: help more shelters >>> spay and neuter more animals >>> rehome more animals >>> continue its active campaign against all animal abuse.

HOW YOU CAN HELP GAR TO HELP ANIMALS IN GREECE...

- By becoming a member (£10 per year)
- By giving a donation
- By donating goods for our fund raising events
- By organising your own events: coffee mornings, sponsored dog walks, car boot sales, raffles, etc.
- By telling your friends and by writing to your local newspaper about GAR's work.

RENA...

Greek Animal Rescue was founded primarily to help injured and abandoned stray dogs and cats in Greece, but when we heard about Rena's plight we felt that we couldn't turn our back on her. They say, "Where there's a will, there's a way", ... we proved this slogan true and not only rescued Rena, but also Duke, whose three years of misery in an Athens zoo came to an end on 16th January 1997.

BACKGROUND STORY, IN BRIEF...

Rena is now about ten years old and she had been kept in appalling conditions on a farm on the Greek island of Kos since she was a cub. Her so-called owner bought her illegally from a gypsies' travelling circus and he already had a collection of other wild animals at his farm, many of which subsequently died from neglect.

Having met Rena in July 1995 during my yearly visit to Greece, my heart went out to her. There was no water or food in sight. Her right paw looked raw, in fact both her front paws appeared badly deformed, causing her to limp and she also had many ticks on her ears.

Upon returning home, I phoned Malcolm Dudding, owner of the Big Cat Sanctuary in Kent, who had already agreed to accept Rena providing we could raise the funds needed for the building of her enclosure - a staggering £30,000 (including the cost of transporting Rena from Greece to UK). Each lion enclosure at the sanctuary measures 71' x 71', which is approximately 650 square metres. In comparison, Rena's cage on the farm measured just 20 square metres, enabling her to take only two steps in any direction and there were no trees or grass - just concrete and metal bars.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL, THERE'S A WAY...

Since we are only a small charity, raising such a huge amount of money was a daunting task, but where there's a will there's a way and so we set about publicising Rena's plight. Five thousand leaflets were printed and distributed, fund-raising events and raffles were organised, letters written to the press, and so on. GAR supporters responded generously to the appeal, as have hundreds of other well-wishers, which was most encouraging, but we had other problems besides financial.

Because Rena was being kept illegally, proceedings had to be taken against the owner to confiscate her. Thankfully, Athens-based Angela Fleming, an active animal welfarist and campaigner has agreed to deal with these matters on our behalf. We needed to obtain a Court Injunction to confiscate Rena before she could be transported to the UK. This was finally achieved early in March 1997, after a 14 month battle with legal proceedings, endless bureaucratic red tape, etc. Alas, as it turned out, the battle to rescue Rena was far from over, because her so-called owner and his mob of supporters decided to take the law into their own hands.

When we arrived at the farm on 19th March, with the court injunction to confiscate Rena (but inadequate police protection), we were attacked by a screaming mob of around hundred people, who attempted to overturn our car and generally behaved in a very threatening manner. We were lucky to escape unhurt, but sadly we had to leave Rena behind.

FAILED MISSION & RENEWED HOPE...

Having been forced to return from Kos without Rena, we pondered what course of action to take next. The Court Injunction to confiscate her was not worth the paper it was written on if the authorities were not prepared to uphold law and order. Without their co-operation the rescue could not be finalised.

It was to take another five months before Rena was finally rescued ... five frustrating months of letter writing, faxes and phone calls, appeals to British MPs and MEPs to support our campaign, etc. At long last we succeeded.

THE DAY WE HAD BEEN WAITING FOR FINALLY ARRIVED ... Our lengthy campaign to rescue Rena came to an end on 18th August, when she was removed from the farm on Kos. After a 12 hour ferry crossing to Piraeus, she was flown to Heathrow the following day, arriving at the Big Cat Sanctuary on Tuesday evening at 7pm. Words cannot express how I felt when the van containing Rena pulled into the drive at the sanctuary! It was a dream come true! A dream which at one point was slipping away, but we just couldn't accept that we had reached the end of the road. Our efforts finally paid off and Rena is today a happy and contented lioness, enjoying her spacious new home with Duke ... the first lion she saw since she was removed from her mother as a cub.

RENA, EXPLORING HER NEW HOME FOR THE FIRST TIME...

Rena didn't hesitate to emerge from her sleeping quarters, but she walked around the enclosure slowly, smelling the grass and the shrubs ... then she gazed across the field, stretching her neck, as if to see better. She was alert, yet at the same time quite relaxed and looking very much at home. Alas, she was limping and periodically she would lie down and rest, but then curiosity would spur her to get up again and explore more of her new home. At one point, as she was lying down with her front legs stretched out, her stumpy paws gently started to knead the grass. Tears welled up in my eyes, it was so moving to watch her.

The battle to rescue Rena has been long and hard, fraught with difficulties and endless red tape, not to mention frustrations, but finally we saw a light at the end of the long tunnel. It wasn't the stubbornness which kept us going, but the knowledge that should we have failed in our mission to rescue Rena, she would have been doomed to spend the rest of her life in that miserable cage, her deformed paws would never have received treatment ... she would have died not even knowing what it felt like to walk on soft grass.

By rescuing Duke and Rena, we have also undertaken the responsibility to provide them with the best possible care for the rest of their lives, but raising £5,000 per year (not including veterinary expenses) for their keep will not be an easy task for our small charity. However, we hope this money can be raised with sponsorships and special fund-raising events.

DUKE, NO LONGER A SAD LION...

But for Rena, Duke would not be here, because the enclosure was originally built for her, but when we heard about his plight, we didn't hesitate to adopt him. Of course we were aware that taking care of two lions would mean twice the expense, but we were prepared to undertake this responsibility. Besides, it would be good for Duke and Rena to have each other for company, and being roughly the same age (ten), they had a good few years ahead of them.

When I first saw Duke in 1994, he was sharing an enclosure with another male lion, who was in a dreadful state; mercifully he was put to sleep five months later, following a damning article in the Daily Mail.

I saw Duke again in August 1995 - he looked miserable and lethargic.

At the time of launching our campaign to rescue Rena in January 1996, we had no idea that we would adopt Duke. However, by the time we were approached by the Mayor of Nea Philadelphia early in November (1996), we had already discussed this possibility. In view of the fact that all enclosures at the Kent Sanctuary are built to accommodate two big cats, we didn't take long to decide and besides, we thought that it would be nice for Rena to have company in the years to come.

Watching Duke now, strutting around the enclosure at the sanctuary, head held high and all his senses alive, is a sight to behold. He looks truly magnificent! His coat is shiny, his mane immaculate, the pockmarks on his back and sides have completely disappeared, but the most noticeable change is the contented look in his eyes! Not so long ago those eyes were dead, expressionless, filled with boredom, loneliness... His days in the zoo cage were spent mostly sleeping, because there was nothing for him to do or look at ... he was a very sad lion indeed!

By sponsoring Duke and Rena for £5 per month, you will help provide for their present and future needs. In return, you will receive enlarged photographs and regular updates through GAR newsletters. The sponsorship may be paid either in a lump sum (i.e., £60 in total), by monthly cheques/postal orders, or through a bank via monthly standing order, ensuring a regular income for the care of our big cats.

The Southern Anti-Blood Sports Campaign -

Support the Portsmouth Three

The Hursley Hambledon Hunt is a vicious hunt notorious for violence against sabs. Because of this it is unsafe for a small group of sabs to attend this hunt. However hunt saboteurs are not prepared to allow hunts to terrorise them into not sabbing and so, every so often, a mass hit is organised against the Hursley Hambledon to both save the lives of innocent animals and to show the hunt their terror tactics won't work. Experience has shown that there is safety in numbers.

Just recently there has been a lot of extreme violence shown towards hunt saboteurs across Britain. This has included sab vans being rammed and windows broken and sabs being hospitalised after assaults by hunt members. Sabs have been threatened with guns and in one incident, the home of a leading Dorset hunt sab, who has been issued with death threats warning him not to sab, was visited by a gang of hunt supporters who were wielding machete type blades.

It is in recognition of the fact that no hunt must be allowed to terrorise sabs away from attending it, but with acknowledgement of a very real threat of violence from the Hursley Hambledon hunt thugs that a mass hunt sab was organised - this hunt sab was very well publicised. People openly discussed this sab over a month before it actually happened.

On the day of the hit (Saturday, 13th December 1997) it was decided that everyone would meet up at a common meeting point and go in convoy to the Meet. This was because it was feared if lone vans were spotted by the hunt they would be vulnerable to attack. To show how well publicised this hunt sab was, at the meeting point there were between 9 to 14 sab vans, a police Range Rover and a police spotter plane in the sky above. Most of the vans contained sabs from the South Coast, groups from Dorset to Sussex. However a few of them were from outside of the region and were people unknown to the South Coast sabs.

Having all met up at the prearranged point the vans set off in convoy, followed by the police Range Rover with the spotter plane flying overhead. For some unknown reason, just before getting to the hunt Meet, the police vehicle turned off and went down a side road. There was not a single police officer present at the hunt when the sabs arrived!

At the Hunt Meet, having parked their vans, all the sabs got out of their vehicles and headed towards the hunters.

According to a sab who wishes to remain anonymous; "We all started walking towards the hunt when suddenly we heard a fracas going on behind us. We turned around and saw people smashing up the hunt vehicles."

Although most of the vans were those of hunt sabs intent on lawful hunt sabotage, some of the vans which came from outside of the region were full of Hunt Retribution Squad activists. The HRS jumped out of their vehicles and headed straight for the hunters' vehicles which they proceeded to smash up. The intention of the HRS appears to be mainly criminal damage with no premeditation to injure or harm the hunt and their supporters. Where 'assaults' took place, it was the fox hunters trying to stop their vehicles being attacked and they were forcefully pushed aside. The HRS activists did not stop until every hunt vehicle had its windows and lights smashed, they then jumped back into their vans and fled. The hunt sabs, realising that the Hursley Hambledon hunt was likely to take revenge on any sabs in the area decided that this was also an ideal time for them to leave.

The Hunt Retribution Squad action was obviously well planned and professionally executed. The HRS activists have obviously never revealed their identity, but they clearly had an escape route organised and were able to leave the county as planned before the police were able to react to what had happened. Sadly, as the South Coast hunt sabs had not been priviledge to any knowledge about what was going to happen they did not have any 'escape routes' planned out.

The police set up a number of road blocks which failed to capture any of the HRS activists but instead caught the innocent hunt sabs who were travelling across Hampshire to return to their respective homes.

The police road blocks caught a total of five of the sab vehicles. All of the vehicles they caught were South Coast hunt sabs, from Dorchester, Southampton, Portsmouth and Dover, none of whom had taken part in the HRS action. In total the police arrested forty two people. All 42 were taken to police cells, subjected to strip searches and had their clothes confiscated. They were held for 36 hours, had their homes raided and vehicles impounded. The police even decided to raid the homes of some people who weren't even on the hit!

Having been held for 36 hours all the sabs were eventually released on police bail to return in February 1998 where they were told they could face charges of 'Conspiracy to commit criminal damage, ABH and violent disorder'.

In the middle of February 1998 the hunt sabs surrendered themselves into police custody. When they did so they found that the police intended to single out three long-standing members of the Portsmouth sab group who they accuse of 'masterminding' the sab. Out of a total of 42 sabs arrested these three individuals are the only ones facing charges, they are being made scapegoats by the police for everything that happened on the day. They have all been charged with 'conspiracy to commit violent disorder'.

As a result of the police laying charges against the three defendants a Support Campaign has been set up to help them. This campaign is made up of friends and supporters of those arrested. We ask for as many people as possible to join the campaign and show your support with the defendants by:

- Sabbing the hunts. All those arrested are dedicated hunt sabs who are committed to defending wildlife. Carrying out hunt sabotage on a regular basis will both directly help to save animal lives and show the police and hunts that we will not be intimidated by their tactics.
- If you are unable to sab, then another way to show your support for both the defendants and the animals is to do everything possible to help make sure the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill becomes law.
- Waiting for trial can be a traumatic time. Send letters of support to the defendants c/o:

THE FOX PROJECT

By December 31st, The Fox Project had, throughout the year, received 385 foxes - so they need all the support they can get, and they will certainly need all the help they can get now that they've entered the 1998 cub season.

There are lots of ways that you can help The Fox Project. These include; practical help i.e. carpentry or cement laying. Can you make up cages or transport boxes? Do you have any experience with electrical work or plumbing? Please let The Fox Project know if you have any skills or materials that might help reduce their costs and make the funds go further.

If you aren't particularly DIY minded, you might consider signing up as a 'cabbie'. This is a job somewhere between that of a fosterer and a rescuer, where you might be asked to transport an already boxed-up animal from A to B in order to take some of the pressure off ambulance drivers - and it is a vital job. The Project's existing cabbies have saved many lives just by being available at the right time to pull an animal in for urgent treatment. The Fox Project will give anyone interested in the above all the help they can.

Those who are unable to give practical help could help financially. As you can imagine, equipment is very expensive. An average single, successful rescue costs around £30 in fuel, food and vet fees. Each cub raised from infancy to rehabilitation costs over £100. You can imagine just how much it costs dealing with over 300 foxes!

The Gandalf Trial

by Noel Molland

In the first few minutes of January 17th 1996, just after midnight, I found myself sitting in a stranger's house, talking to two people (Robin Webb and Saxon Wood) who I had only just met, but we had all been charged with being involved in a Conspiracy together. Our host had just gone out to pick up three other men. The other three (Simon Russell, Paul Rogers and Stephen Booth) again, were people who I did not know. Once again, they were also people that I was accused of conspiring with. As Robin, Sax and I sat there talking, the door opened and in walked Simon Russell. Upon seeing Robin he said, "You bastard. If you'd been found guilty, none of us would be here!" This was said in jest. However, it turned out to be the truth.

Back in the early 1990s an aspiring CID officer, Desmond Thomas, found himself the senior officer in charge of an animal rights investigation concerning an arson attack that had taken place in Hampshire. He had been involved in animal rights investigations before, but this was the very first time that he was the officer in charge of the case. Being keen on promotion, Thomas was enthusiastic about impressing his superiors and catching the activists involved. However, that was not to be the case. The only thing that Thomas was able to find out about the activists was that they were part of a 'group' calling itself the Animal Liberation Front. He discovered this when Robin Webb, the ALF Press Officer, claimed the action to be the work of the ALF.

Over the next few years, Thomas was to be the senior officer in charge of a number of animal rights investigations. Each time he failed to discover who was responsible for the actions. The only lead Thomas ever had was that the actions were always claimed by Robin Webb on behalf of one group or another, be it the ALF or whoever.

This led Thomas to become convinced that Robin Webb was somehow connected with the actions and so he started to investigate Robin Webb personally, trying to find anything to link Robin with any criminal offence. What Thomas was to regard as the breakthrough came when Robin was sent a Press Release by the Poultry Liberation Organisation (PLO) claiming responsibility for an egg contamination in Tesco's supermarket. In his role as ALF Press Officer, Robin passed this Press Release on to the media. Under some obscure law it is illegal to tell the media that food has been contaminated, even if you are merely doing so out of concern for public safety.

In August 1994, the police visited Robin at his home to interview him about the claim and he gave them the phone number of his solicitor and told them to go away. Later that evening the police returned with a search warrant and turned the place over. At that time they told Robin that they would interview him even if they had to arrest him. However, he was not arrested on that occasion.

In November 1994, Robin was arrested at Cambridge police station by Hampshire police when he went in to sign on for bail for other reasons. Robin made no reply to police questions and was released on bail. As well as arresting Robin for the PLO claim, Thomas also arrested two other people who he believed had produced the Press Release. They were Gillian Peachey and Jeanette McClunan. Over time the case against both Jeanette and later Gillian was dropped leaving the police with Robin.

When Robin replied to bail in January 1995 the police arrested him again and searched his house and then took him off to Winchester where he was charged and remanded to prison. During the weekend at the police station it was DS Betts who told Robin that "We are going to lock you up to shut you up".

On Robin's first couple of appearances at the magistrates court DC Thomas ignored the actual charges and invoked "arson, incitement, conspiracy and parcel bombs", linked him with the IRA and described Robin as the "Gerry Adams of the animal liberation movement". Robin was to spend nearly seven months in custody. The reason Thomas gave the court for not allowing Robin bail was that, should he be released he would incite people to commit criminal damage and conspire with others to commit criminal damage.

After almost seven months of bail applications being turned down on these grounds, Robin's legal team told the police they should either charge him with Incitement/Conspiracy to Incite or let him go. It was the Crown Prosecutor who told a High Court judge he would not be charging Robin with Incitement/Conspiracy to Incite with the evidence he had and so Robin was released on bail. At the contamination trial, just a few days before it began, the original Crown Court judge was replaced for unspecified "security reasons". At the end of the prosecution case, but following a submission from his barrister, the judge instructed the jury to find Robin not guilty.

The fact that Robin had been cleared of the PLO claim led DC Thomas to develop an almost fanatical hatred of Robin Webb and was determined not to be beaten. In the run up to the PLO egg contamination claim trial, Thomas had launched a major investigation to find evidence that Robin Webb had incited people to commit criminal damage and had conspired with others to incite criminal damage. Once again, Thomas regarded what he saw as a breakthrough the discovery of a magazine called 'Green Anarchist' which was reporting a regular Diary of Animal Liberation actions. These diaries contained long listings of ALF and similar groups actions from around the world. Green Anarchist magazine was also, through its mail order department, openly selling copies of publications such as 'Into the 1990s with the Animal Liberation Front', 'Interviews with ALF activists', 'Going Underground for Animal Liberation', etc., etc. Thomas realised that here was a magazine that he could possibly prosecute for Conspiracy to Incite Persons Unknown to Commit Criminal Damage. All he needed to do was find a way to link Robin Webb with the magazine and he could have his arch-nemesis jailed. And so started what turned out to be nearly a year-long investigation with fifty-five raids against various addresses, property seized, etc. Things didn't look promising.

I do not wish to talk about the others, but in my own case Thomas discovered that I was the person who compiled the Diary of Animal Liberation. I had a number of international animal rights contacts, some of whom I was supplying Black Widow slingshots to where such items are banned in their own countries. There was also evidence to show that I was very involved with the animal liberation movement and I supplied animal liberation information to a large number of magazines across the world. The police also had a theory that I was actively engaged in both Animal Liberation Front and Earth Liberation Front activity and were subsequently investigating me for, amongst other things, an attempted arson in Cornwall, a bomb hoax in Plymouth, involvement with tree-spiking and a plan to scuttle live animal export ferries Sea Shepherd style, etc.

However, despite all these investigations (and despite arresting me for an alleged bomb hoax and despite telling the media they had foiled an attempt to scuttle ferries by "animal rights extremists") they could not find any firm evidence of illegal activity. The police also passed on the names and addresses of my overseas contacts to the police forces in those other countries. I don't know how much info was exchanged but certainly by the time a friend in New Zealand, Mark Eden, was arrested for Animal Liberation Front activity, a New Zealand newspaper reported that the NZ and UK police were exchanging a fair amount of information.

There is one thing to note about international policing operations. Whilst Hampshire CID were investigating and trying to stop the reporting of Animal Liberation activity in this country, so similar events were taking place across Europe and Scandinavia. A German animal liberation magazine was raided after it reported the events around two high profile animal liberation arsons. A Dutch magazine was raided after it published a press release by the Earth Liberation Front claiming responsibility for a bomb exploding inside an empty building owned by a company involved with the dumping of toxic waste. The Finnish Animal Liberation Front Supporters Group was actually forced to close down for a while after the Finnish police used two high profile EVR (Finnish ALF) arsons as their excuse to harass known animal liberation activists. There does seem to be evidence to suggest that the criminalising of the reporting of Animal/Earth liberation direct action was not just limited to Britain and may have been part of a wider European policing operation. Whilst on that subject, Hampshire police actually took a publicly-funded trip to Italy just to speak to someone who wrote Robin Webb a letter!

Despite everything, the police could not prove their was any agreement to incite persons unknown to commit criminal damage. There wasn't even any evidence to suggest the people involved with Green Anarchist actually ever met others involved with the magazine. For example, in my own case, I was only concerned with the Animal Liberation news, the prisoner news and later on the EcoDefence news. I would compile all of the information together, relating to those issues and every three months or so I would post it off to a Box address in Oxford. Before the arrest I never met anyone else connected to Green Anarchist magazine. Therefore, because links were so vague, the police decided they would leave Green Anarchist and see what was going to happen with the PLO trial.

Three days after the PLO trial was thrown out of court, Hampshire police decided they would prosecute Robin Webb, Simon Russell and four other people identified as being linked with Green Anarchist. On the 16th January 1996 the police launched a series of dawn raids which resulted in the people who would later be known as the Gandalf Six being arrested. The reasons why we were each selected became clear as the case went ahead. Robin Webb was the main target of the police and the one they most wanted to jail. I compiled the Diary of Animal Liberation. The police hoped that through the Diary they would be able to link Robin Webb to Green Anarchist magazine. Paul Rogers is the Editor of Green Anarchist and therefore, under the law, he is ultimately responsible for everything it publishes and advertises. Saxon Wood ran the Green Anarchist mail order and distributed copies of 'Into the 1990s', etc. Stephen Booth was in charge of the accounts for Green Anarchist. He also organised subscriptions, etc. Simon Russell had links with Robin Webb, but they knew each other several years before this case was brought. As Editor of the ALFSG Newsletter, Simon was in contact with Robin Webb with regards to the ALF Press Office. I, on the other hand, was writing a book about the animal liberation movement and I had been in contact with Simon regarding its possible publication. The only contact I had with Robin was that I had written a few letters of support to him while he was in prison. Robin had also provided Green Anarchist with a listing of Justice Department actions after I had requested them but that was all. The police hoped that Simon would act as a bridge between Robin Webb and myself.

A major setback for the police occurred in December 1996, when at the committal hearing, the defence mentioned the fact that Thomas had said that, with the evidence he had on Robin, he would not charge him with either incitement or conspiracy to incite. The defence was able to show that the police really didn't have any substantial new evidence and so the case against Robin was thrown out. Sadly, the rest of us were committed for trial.

Whilst the committal was taking place, Hampshire CID were raiding and arresting more people. There is evidence to suggest that had the Gandalf case been thrown out at committal the police were all prepared to have yet another go at prosecuting Robin Webb and others.

However, rather than the whole case being thrown out, just the case against Robin was thrown out because the police had abused the process of law by bringing about this prosecution. This left the Prosecution without their star defendant. So, rather than accepting the legal ruling that just prosecuting Robin Webb on the whim of one senior police officer was an abuse of the legal system, the Prosecution instantly announced it would appeal the Magistrates ruling. The rest of us prepared for trial.

And so, on the 26th August 1997, the trial started. On the very first day of the trial, the Judge and the Prosecution had a meeting behind closed doors to discuss Public Interest Immunity certificates, i.e. what evidence should not be made available to the defence. Also within a few weeks Paul Rogers had a disagreement with his barrister which finally resulted in the barrister being forced to resign as Paul refused to talk to him. Paul was subsequently severed from the trial to enable him to find new legal representation to stand trial at a later date.

Without going into all the details (it did last 12 weeks after all) the trial was a farce; aspects of the trial including the Judge (Judge Selwood) very quickly making his own bias known by helping the police when they were being cross-examined and correcting them when they contradicted themselves. Selwood failed to exclude a juror who admitted he knew an animal abuser who had been the target of an ALF arson attack and the details of which were in the evidence. At the start of the trial the Defence asked that jurors be excluded if they had links with the military. Not only did Selwood fail to do this, he himself had held the rank of Major General and had spent all but five years of his career officiating over military courts with NATO. Selwood also disallowed the Defence to ask all their questions and one barrister was forced to threaten to resign before he was allowed to continue with his line of questioning. Selwood disallowed certain evidence (e.g. the stuff relating to my slingshot exports) only to try and reverse his decision later on, after the defence campaign was all worked out.

During the summing up Selwood was clearly drunk on one occasion and he muddled up the defendants' names. And in both the cross-examination of defendants and his summing up, Selwood acted as second prosecutor, raising the attention of the jury to matters not picked up on by the Prosecution. The police were no better. During the trial they tried to claim that Simon had incited people to carry out ALF activity by offering to support prisoners financially through the ALF Supporters Group (something that Selwood did reject!).

A senior police officer also, whilst on oath, when referring to a piece of Arkangel headed notepaper that had been signed Robin, deliberately tried to mislead the court into thinking the Robin was in fact Robin Webb. This was despite the fact the police were well aware of who the other Robin is and the fact the two Robins' handwriting are totally different. The only excuse the officer could give for his mistake was the way the name Robin was spelt, which in both cases was the same! And just to add an international political basis to the trial, one of the main pieces of evidence relied upon by the police against Simon Russell was a list of Justice Department actions that appeared on the Internet. This list of actions was actually put on the Internet by former Canadian ALF activist, Darren Thurston. Darren agreed to fly to the UK to testify to this effect. However, on arrival at Heathrow, Darren was immediately deported as an undesirable alien, on advice received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This was despite the fact Immigration knew Darren was to appear as a Defence witness in what was turning out to be quite a complicated trial. The person who went to meet Darren at the airport was Simon Russell. Simon was greeted by Immigration and Special Branch officers who detained him all day asking him various questions about Darren.

As for the arguments of the case. The police tried very hard to create a smokescreen with regards to the distribution of copies of 'Into the 1990s with the ALF'. However, their real objection was the reporting of Animal Liberation Front actions. At a previous trial in Cardiff in 1988, two defendants, Sally Carr and Robin Lane, were prosecuted for Conspiracy to Incite Others to Commit Criminal Damage and were sentenced to 18 months imprisonment with nine months suspended. It was clear that throughout the Cardiff proceedings, the main objection was that of reporting ALF actions by way of the 'Diary of Actions' and the 'Action Reports'.

To state the arguments that the police used against me; because I support the ALF, I, therefore wish for ALF actions to occur. I, then, regard lists of ALF actions to be "good news" (this was an expression frequently used by the prosecution). Therefore, because I want ALF actions to occur and because I regard lists of ALF actions to be "good news", if I compile any lists of actions it is to incite further actions. Or to put it another way, because I support the ALF it is illegal for me to report their actions.

However, the police still had one point to try and prove an actual Conspiracy to Incite. Here the Prosecution had to admit there was no such formal agreement to incite persons unknown to commit criminal damage. However, they said that the word Conspiracy did not automatically mean an actual firm agreement. You could have an implied conspiracy, where although there wasn't any firm agreement, people just knew they were agreeing with others to do something illegal. Again using myself as an example (because I refuse to claim to speak on behalf of others) I compile lists of ALF actions. This the police say can only be to incite others. I also know that other people are doing things the police claim incite ALF actions. Therefore because I am doing something the police say is illegal and because I know that other people are doing something that the police say is also illegal and because the 'illegal' actions are similar, I must therefore be involved in a Conspiracy with these other people. It is an 'implied conspiracy'. The Prosecution was most clear that you do not need to ever have met or communicated with the other people you are in an implied conspiracy with. All you need to do is know that someone, somewhere, is doing similar things to yourself.

The end result of this playing with words, was that Simon Russell was found Not Guilty. Sax, Steve and I were all found Guilty of being involved in a Conspiracy to Incite Persons Unknown to Commit Criminal Damage (along with Robin Webb who wasn't even on trial). This was despite the fact that we have nothing in common and prior to our arrests we did not even know each other. I am a vegan Animal Liberation activist who has become inspired by Deep Ecology. Saxon is a vegan 'Straightedge' environmental anarchist activist whose main interest is punk music. Steve is a meat-eating anarchist who is neither into Animal Liberation nor environmentalism and whose priorities lay squarely with human liberation. We have nothing in common and share no common agenda, yet we were found guilty of being in an implied conspiracy together.

After we were found Guilty, initially the Judge said he wanted to give us four years imprisonment. However, after hearing submissions from our barristers about what nice people we all are, the Judge decided to 'only' give us three years each. But don't think this is the end of the Gandalf Trial. As a result of a Judicial Review in the High Court (incidentally, one of the presiding Judges was the one who gave Keith Mann his original 14 years imprisonment!) Robin Webb will, along with Paul Rogers, stand trial for Conspiracy to Incite Persons Unknown to Commit Criminal Damage, sometime during 1998.

A great deal of publicity has been given to this trial, mainly due to the excellent hard work of the Gandalf Defendants' Campaign (or Neil Hansen as he is otherwise known). People are saying that the result of this trial is terrible. Well yes, it is bad that the Animal Liberation movement is being told that we can't disseminate our own information. But what is worse is the abuse of animals. As a prisoner I will not be cut open, electrocuted, crushed, radiated, poisoned, chased to exhaustion, ripped apart by dogs. I will not be hooked, beaten, kept cramped up in the dark unable to move. I will not be tortured, etc., etc. - unlike all the millions of animals that are being subjected to such horrors as you read this article.

The best support anyone can give is not to sit around saying "shame" but to get up and get active. Redouble your efforts to end the horrors that animal abuse entails. The animals are dying now.

Violence is Wrong!

by Rabbix

The quote below comes from a little known Animal Liberation book 'The Cement Cross' by Edward Edwards A.D. I think the final part of the citation really sums up the problem with advocating violent direct action:

"Just imagine if Animal Liberation emulated the Irish Republican Army, the Palestine Liberation Organisation and all the other well known factions who turned to the bomb to push their cause, when all other methods failed. And realise what it would mean. It would be no good the media, newspapers, radio, TV stations, spouting one-sided terrorists, as Big Business / Government sponsored media would do. Because very few people could be classified as innocent"

The last line suggests that any action can be justified on the grounds of Animal / Earth liberation. This view of everyone being guilty of animal abuse is reflected in the publication 'A Declaration of War' by Screaming Wolf. According to Screaming Wolf everyone is guilty of animal murder. The Animal Liberation Front activist is covered in less blood than the hunt scum, but their 'original sin' of being born human is still there. Both 'A declaration of War' and 'Cement Cross' glory violent direct action, which is something I find abhorrent.

Because I find the idea of violent direct action wrong, I had published in Arkangel 17 an article entitled 'A Question of Violence'. In Arkangel 18, Barry Horne responded with another article entitled 'Another Question of Violence'. In his article Barry raised a number of points. The first point made was: being an Animal Liberation activist means putting the needs of the animals first. I totally agree with this but I do not agree that the needs of the animals are served by adopting the use of violence. In fact I would argue that adopting the use of violence does the animals more harm than good.

It is my personal point of view that if the Animal/Earth liberation movement adopts a general acceptance of the use of violence then the movement will become smaller. People who support Animal/Earth liberation might be put off becoming active within the movement because it may be seen as too extreme. Rather than encouraging further acts of liberation, violent direct action merely pushes people away. At my trial (GAndALF), I saw a very good friend, who had come down to support me, actually shy away from me after the judge referred to my 1993 article 'Ethical Violence'.

Violent direct action, in my mind, does not encourage people to become involved with Animal/Earth liberation activity. Instead, it scares people away. It will not help the animals if the very people trying to help the animals are putting other people off fighting for Animal/Earth liberation.

The second point made in Barry's article is that to condemn violence is speciesist. I once used that argument myself in 'Ethical Violence'. The contention that condemning violent direct action is speciesist goes along these lines:

If (for example) Joe Bloggs witnessed Sid Smith just about to shoot dead a large group of children but Joe Bloggs was able to kill Sid Smith first then no one would criticise Joe for the murder of Sid. By carrying out his act of violence, Joe prevented a greater act of violence (or to put it another way, it is considered ethical to kill one person if it saves the lives of hundreds). The person who is in favour of violent direct action then goes on to point out that animals are being killed every day by animal abusers and therefore, by killing one animal abuser to save the lives of hundreds of animals is also ethical. To say otherwise is speciesist. And of course there is little argument against this analysis.

However, to adopt such an analysis is to accept the use of violence. It says that violence is okay. As Animal/Earth liberation activists we should be moving away from violence. We should be saying that violence is wrong. We should be showing the world how to work and react without resorting to violence and the deliberate creation of suffering is part of the problem, not the solution. Rather than killing the vivisector people should be trying to rescue the animals. If a vivisector dies then another one will merely take over where the other one left off. Of course I would have absolutely no problem with the lab being destroyed and all the animals rescued.

The third point that Barry made is really more of a question. I am asked, have I ever considered the fact that the Justice Department letter-bombs are specifically designed so they are unable to kill? The simple answer is yes! Having been subjected by Hampshire Police, at my Committal hearing, to long detailed descriptions of exactly how JD letter-bombs work, I am fully aware of both how they are made, how they work and how they are incapable of causing death to individuals. They can, however, still result in physical injury and cause psychological trauma. As I said in my original article, I am against the creation of suffering be it in non-human or human animals. I want to help create a new system, free from human created suffering. I do not wish to merely replicate the violence of the old system.

The fourth point that Barry made in his article is that I am criticised for being critical of an action carried out to commemorate the murder of hunt sab, Mike Hill. The action in question being a Hunt Retribution Squad assault on a blood-junkie. Now, don't get me wrong, I totally respect the motives of the activists who carried out their anger at the Cheshire Beagles. But I have one question. What good did their action (the whipping of a lone hunt scum) do? Did the assault prevent animal suffering? No. Has it educated the public to the cruelty created by the hunting of animals with hounds? No. So what good did the action do?

I, of course, recognise the activists who carried out the assault to be good, caring, well-meaning people. However, I argue that their time and effort could have been put to better use. As I see it, an attack on a lone blood-junkie will not stop a hunt. Economic sabotage could, in my opinion, do so!

Barry's fifth and final point is that I should look at the motives behind the use of violent direct action, rather than just look at the action itself. Throughout this article, my previous article and other articles I have written I have consistently said that I do not criticise the motives behind any genuine Animal/Earth liberation inspired actions. However, just because I do not question the activists' motives does not mean I will not be critical of a particular action.

In early 1995, when two anti-live exports activists (Barb Trenholm and Justin Wright) were first arrested for an arson attack on a pub frequented by animal abusers I was critical of their action. But, despite my criticism, I also strongly argued that they should be supported by the ALF Supporters Group and the Earth Liberation Prisoners Journal. Even if people did not agree with the action itself, Barbara and Justin should still be supported because of their motives - which were to help animals and to reduce their suffering. Although I personally do not feel that an arson attack on a pub full of animal abusers will achieve Animal/Earth liberation, Barbara and Justine clearly did. They believed that the attack would help bring about the abolition of the trade in live animal exports and as such should be supported whilst in prison. I have always held that point of view, as I am sure Barb will vouch.

If an Animal/Earth liberation activist ends up in prison for Animal/Earth liberation reasons they should be supported, regardless of their action, because they carried it out in the belief it would help the animals. However, just because someone agrees with an activist's motives does not mean they should shy away from a critical analysis of the action if they feel strongly that the action is not helping to advance the cause of Animal/Earth liberation.

I do not feel that violent direct action will help advance the cause of Animal/Earth liberation. Of course, in general I support the motives of the people who carry out violent direct action but I do not support their actions. Premeditated violence, in my view, is wrong, be it against non-human animals or human animals. And if you believe something is wrong you should speak out against it. To be silent and say nothing is to condone. You must stand up for what you believe in. If you don't then why stand up at all?

Elephant Hospital

in Thailand

There is an elephant hospital which lies 650km north of Bangkok, in the region where elephants have traditionally been used in logging operations - dragging timber out of the forests to the roads. The hospital is a refuge for injured and sick elephants.

Established in 1994 by Ms Soraida Salwala, the hospital consists of open-sided buildings that provide shelter from the sun and allow cooling breezes to blow through, and over 100 elephants have been treated there. Ms Salwala was determined to relieve the suffering of elephants ever since she saw one badly injured and dying on the roadside. Baby elephants are also taken in by the hospital. Baby elephants are traded to be trained either to work in the forests or in circuses. Many are smuggled in from Burma. They suffer from stress that affects them physically and emotionally and many die as a result. Some are fortunate enough to be brought to the hospital.

The hospital urgently needs medicines and surgical and other equipment. The hospital raises money in Thailand to pay for food, etc. but needs help to buy essential equipment.

PICAS

(Pigeon Control Advisory Service)

PICAS was formed in January 1998 as a non-profit making consultative body advising on all aspects of pigeon control. Guy Merchant, who founded the organisation, has studied pigeons and the effects of control on the species for many years. He is also Projects Manager for CARES Wildlife Hospital in Cambridgeshire which is one of the largest wildlife hospitals in the country. PICAS was formed to deal with an ever increasing number of enquiries received at the hospital asking for advice on humane and effective alternatives to lethal control. PICAS aims to provide independent advice based on research and not profit.

Pigeon Control

Historically, methods of pigeon control have been largely unsuccessful due, in the main, to a lack of understanding of the species. Towns and cities all over the UK and indeed all over the world have tried to control numbers of pigeons using a wide variety of methods including lethal control, deterrents and trapping. All of these methods have failed to reduce the numbers of birds in the long term and have involved considerable financial outlay, to say nothing of the humanitarian implications.

Control Methods Commonly Used

Methods of control used by pest control companies include putting down poisoned or narcotic bait, shooting birds in their roosting sites and trapping operations.

Poisoning

The use of poisons and narcotics as a method of control is less common but still used by pest control companies. Poisons ensure that the birds taking the bait die a slow and agonising death. The purpose of narcotic bait is to induce stupor in the bird so that it is easily caught and despatched. Many birds, however, are not caught by the pest control operatives and are killed by motorists on the roads or by cats and other predators. The danger with the use of poisons and narcotics is that the affected birds become a lethal part of the food chain.

Shooting

Shooting as a method of control is widely used by pest control companies and birds are usually shot at night whilst roosting. Air rifles are generally used to shoot the birds and the operatives carrying out the task are often inexperienced and untrained. As it is almost impossible to kill a bird of this size with an air rifle a majority of the birds are wounded and then left to die. Wildlife hospitals treat large numbers of pigeons that have been shot and wounded as a part of a pest control operation.

Trapping

Trapping as a means of control is widespread. This method involves encouraging the birds into baited traps, normally placed in their roosting or feeding area. Once a certain number of birds are trapped they are removed and their necks will be broken. The traps will then be re-set. Alternatively the birds may be trapped and removed for release elsewhere, but this is less common. Although there is a legal requirement for anyone setting traps to inspect their traps every 24 hours, not all pest control companies comply with this legislation and the birds are often left to starve or die of exposure.

Deterrents

Anti-perching devices are used extensively to deter pigeons from roosting on a specific site. These devices can be extremely effective and are ideal for a property owner or leaseholder who sees roosting pigeons on his/her property as a problem. Inevitably, however, it will only move the pigeons onto a neighbouring building to become someone else's problem. It must also be pointed out that some of the recognised anti-perching devices can be harmful and indeed lethal to pigeons. Where netting is used birds often become entangled and die of starvation. Where nylon line is used it often breaks and becomes wrapped around the legs of the bird, hobbling it. Many birds are admitted to wildlife hospitals in a distressed state having come into contact with the anti-perching jelly used on roosting sites.

In short, anti-perching devices are a good method of deterring pigeons from roosting or perching on a specific building as long as an appropriate deterrent is chosen. Ideally, advice should be sought from an independent source, not a pest control company who will have a vested interest in selling a product irrespective of its implication for the welfare of the birds. As with all accepted control methods, deterrents are a 'quick fix' and do not tackle the problem at source.

Why Commonly Used Methods Fail

reduction of pigeon numbers. In areas where any of these control operations have been put into place there will be seen to be an initial short-term reduction in numbers. Within 1-3 months, however, pigeon numbers will have increased to the pre-cull figure and possibly will have exceeded it. This is because killing adult pigeons in a feeding flock favours the younger birds that would otherwise have no chance of survival. Many older non-breeding birds are removed during these operations and the younger healthy breeding stock remain.

Pigeons control their own numbers very effectively according to the food source available to them. An adult pair of pigeons can breed up to 6 times a year producing 2 young each time if the conditions are good and the food supply plentiful. If, however, the food supply is dramatically reduced and there is only enough food to support the existing flock, adult birds may not breed at all. It can be deduced from this that a problem with over-population of pigeons is more of a people problem than a pigeon problem. If the public could be educated to cease or cut down on their pigeon feeding habits, this measure alone would see a dramatic decrease in pigeon numbers in any given area.

Alternative Control Measures

In 1988 and 1990 the City of Basel introduced a massive public information campaign to educate the public about pigeons and the relationship between feeding and the resultant over-population. Alongside the education campaign the government asked the University of Basel to carry out a scientific study to find a solution to the problem of overpopulation of pigeons in the city. The city had a population of approximately 20,000 pigeons and had tried everything to reduce the population, including killing over 100,000 birds in the preceding 24 years, only to find that they still had a population of 20,000 birds.

This research, carried out between 1988 and 1992, concluded that killing pigeons as a method of long-term control had no effect on the pigeon population. Basel provided 9 designated feeding areas where the public could legitimately feed the pigeons. Adjacent to these areas they built well-kept and controlled pigeon lofts where the local pigeon population were encouraged to nest and roost. These lofts were visited every day and cleaned and any eggs that had been laid were removed. During the 4 year research period over 1200 eggs each year were removed. Over a 50 month period this had the effect of reducing the pigeon population in these test sites by a staggering 50%. Not only were pigeon numbers halved but large quantities of pigeon droppings were removed from the lofts that would otherwise have been spread around the city.

In 1997, a similar scheme was introduced in the town of Bedford by the Borough Council, this being the first scheme of its kind in the UK. Bedford is unusual in that the Borough Council has had a 'no-cull' policy since 1987 and any pigeon control procedure introduced had to be humane and non-lethal. Acting on advice from Guy Merchant (Project Manager for CARES Wildlife Hospital in Cambridgeshire) the Borough Council put a 'Nest-Box' scheme into place in July 1987. This scheme was based on research carried out by Guy Merchant in the 1980s and also loosely based on the research carried out in Basel. The scheme has also been implemented at Ely Cathedral in Cambridgeshire, also acting on advice from CARES.

Summary

There is no doubt that the 'Nest Box' scheme is the way forward for pigeon control in the 1990s. To continue practising lethal control in the face of overwhelming evidence that it is totally ineffective, is absurd. Pest Control companies, however, will continue to advise lethal control against pigeons because it is in their best interests to do so. The problem of overpopulation of pigeons in our towns and cities will not go away and must be tackled at source rather than putting short-term lethal control operations in place. This means that we have to educate the public and ideally provide areas where people can legitimately feed pigeons. We need to provide artificial nesting sites that can be easily cleaned and accessed to remove eggs. These two measures alone will solve many of the problems normally associated with pigeons. They are extremely inexpensive to put into place and totally in tune with our environment. Nest Boxes are cheap and easy to produce and can be sited on or near existing roosting places, i.e. the roofs of buildings, where they will be out of sight of the general public. Education campaigns cost very little to put into place and by involving the media can get extremely wide coverage at no cost at all.

Justice for Keith Mann Campaign

A Statement by Keith Mann

It's with much regret that I'm having to write this as I'm not big on negativity, but it's a fact of life that we have and will always have negative elements in our ranks with the intention of dragging the rest of us down with their personal agendas and egos. Another has just laid his cards on the table. I was quite happy to defend this individual until very recently, but that's all changed now and it's only proper I share my experience.

Sussex-based Dave Hammond began the Justice For Keith Mann Campaign (JFKMC) shortly after I was sentenced in December 1994. And what a good job he did alongside a few others in promoting the campaign. Despite warnings that his motives may not be totally based on getting justice for me, I remained impressed with his determination to help. But lately, as some had predicted, things have turned sour. Hammond decided to use the JFKMC as a vehicle for his own New Vegan Liberation (NVL) "bandwagon" as he described it. The NVL leaflet was a rambling, disjointed rant, ranging across subjects such as the amount of violence in the movement, police informers, agent provocateurs, people who spread misinformation and disharmony in the movement and how it is time we rid ourselves of such people. Knowing what I now know about him, I can't help wondering if he was taking the piss.

The Campaign, including me, decided against paying to send out this leaflet because we weren't happy with the content. Although we should expose infiltrators and informers wherever we find them, as I see it, the more we achieve, the harder they'll work to infiltrate us and we should view it positively as a success.

And there's the old chestnut about the violence. What violence? We suffer plenty, but our hit list of murdered and maimed animal abusers is incredibly puny, non-existent in fact. It's such a non-issue it's not worth going on about.

I wrote to Dave Hammond asking him to clarify certain points. He didn't reply. I phoned him and he said he was actually in the middle of replying and it would be in the post the following day. I've still had no reply two months after writing.

On September 1st he wrote to the Campaign and stated that the solution to the problem was simple: "I (Hammond) send my leaflet to all the Campaign supporters, and it pays for the equivalent postage and stationery needed, once you have supplied me with the complete, up-to-date JFKMC mailing list. Only then will I continue to work with the Campaign, and with you only. Any cost incurred by myself will be paid for by the Campaign. This is my ultimatum and I will not compromise on it. PS. Should you not agree to my terms the Campaign will need a new PO box and I will close the account".

What do you think the response to that was? Immediately a new PO box was sought and bank account opened. Categorically not prepared to be blackmailed. Two days later he sent another stating that he had decided to continue with the Campaign but was prepared to deal with just one named person. After his previous letter it was rather presumptuous that anyone would want to continue working with him. He told me over the phone that he had apologised for his first letter in this one and that this was clearly being hidden from me. I had the letter and still have, and nowhere was there an apology. In one he sent to my mum 3 weeks later he added a PS: "Any excuse I might need for my apparent odd behaviour is I'm only human."

I eventually told him that for the sake of the campaign it would be best if he close the account and forward on the mail. He said he still wanted to help so I suggested he could do so on a one-to-one basis. He agreed.

Soon after, a cheque for £314 was sent to my mum. Hammond wrote that he would forward £1,414 in shares, from when the Alliance and Leicester became a bank, if we decided to cash them in. If we didn't they would have to remain under his control because he claimed they weren't transferable. No need to ponder this one for too long. She told him to cash them in and send the cheque.

She waited, but then got a letter from him in which he explained he'd decided to keep the money for himself. He reasoned that he hadn't understood the details of the share issue at the time. He now reasons that because he is the named account holder, and he holds other accounts with the same bank (all from other campaigns he has failed to see through) he personally owns the shares. This despite numerous references by Hammond over months to the JFKMC shares. And the fact that the campaign ensured the necessary £100 was in the account at the time the shares were issued. His other accounts were never an issue, they contained insignificant amounts and their existence was insignificant. Indeed he'd told me he was keen that if possible, rather than use the money on the campaign, it be saved for me for my release. The long and short of it is the shares were issued because the JFKMC supporters had provided the £100 needed to qualify for the shares. Now Dave Hammond has decided it's his money.

Weigh it up for yourself. Copies of all the letters I've mentioned are in the possession of the SG. The JKFM Campaign has a new PO box where future correspondence should be sent. My mum looks after the campaign account and she can be trusted.

If you want to discuss how he can steal money from a prisoner or anything else you may be concerned about, he still runs the PO Box 1135, Downs View Rd, Hassocks, West Sussex, BN6 8AA - the old campaign address.

Incidentally he has failed, despite requests, to forward proof that the old account has been closed down, nor proof of exactly what was in there when the cheque was sent.

THE VEGAN SOCIETY

Brief History

The Vegan Society was formed in 1944 by a group of vegetarians who had recognised the ethical compromise implicit in lacto (i.e., dairy-dependent) vegetarianism. Today, the Society continues to highlight the breaking of the strong maternal bond between the cow and its newborn calf within just four days; the dairy cow's proneness to lameness and mastitis; her subjection to an intensive cycle of pregnancy and lactation; people's unnatural and unhealthy taste for cow's milk; and the de-oxygenation of river water through contamination with cattle slurry.

Vegan Society Catalogue

The Vegan Society catalogue is now available and contains numerous items including books, leaflets, T-shirts, stickers etc. A list appears below:

The 4th Edition of the Animal Free Shopper is an invaluable guide to what's vegan in the shops and supermarkets. It is available for only £4.95 (inc. p&p)

Books include:

Why Vegan by Kath Clements. A simple and straightforward exposition of the case for veganism. £6.99.

The Dreaded Comparison by Marjorie Spiegel. A penetrating study loaded with shocking comparisons of human and animal slavery, of racism and speciesism. £3.95.

Pregnancy, Children and The Vegan Diet by Michael Klaper MD. A practical guide to ensuring health and balance throughout pregnancy and to raising healthy children on a 100% animal-free diet. £7.95.

Vegan Nutrition by Michael Klaper MD. A practical guide showing how sound vegan diets can satisfy all the body's needs and play a major role in the prevention and treatment of many degenerative diseases. £7.95.

The Vegan Cookbook by Alan Wakeman & Gordon Baskerville. 200 richly varied and carefully graded recipes, ranging from the quick and simple through to the unashamedly gourmet. £7.99.

Leaflets:

Poor cow/calf; Are your meals costing the Earth?,
Leather - the Facts; Join the human race (Health):
100 - £1.75; 500 - £5.95; 1000 - £10.50; 2000 - £19.25.

Stickers, badge, and nutrition chart:

'Vegans Welcome' window sticker £1.25;
Enamel badge £1.45; Vegan Nutrition Chart; £2.50.

Video:

The Vegan Society VHS video (PAL), 22 minutes. An upbeat, informal introduction to the vegan diet - the thinking behind it and health and environmental benefits. Presented by Benjamin Zephaniah and featuring a host of celebrities. £8.95.

Vegecat & Vegekit:

Supplement which is added to recipes (supplied) to provide complete meals for vegan cats. 6 week supply. £8.25.
Vegekit; As for Vegecat but for kittens up to 12 months and lactating queens. 6 weeks supply. £8.25.

Postage & Packing for books, etc.:

Less than £5; 95p; £5-£9.99; £1.50; £10-£19.99; £2.50;
£20-£29.99; £3.25; £30+; £4.50 (free in UK). (Overseas: Europe - multiply rates by 2; Other - multiply rates by 4).

Membership Rates:

Individual: £17, Unwaged Individual £11, Junior (under 18) £9, Family/Joint (living at the same address) £23, Unwaged family/joint (living at the same address) £15, Life £275. Eire & overseas: all applicants must add £5.00. Subscribers receive an informative quarterly magazine.

Good Guys Dress in Black...

by Anon.

I would like to propose a 'dress code' for demonstrations. Already several hunt sab groups are using this tactic and adopting a policy of all wearing the same clothing. This has been shown to be a highly effective and useful thing to do.

The main reason is that it makes it difficult for activists to be identified individually, either by the police or by animal abusers. This doesn't necessarily mean that someone will have done something illegal; even if they have just irritated the police, or are known to be an 'organiser' they can be arrested. We all know how the police are expert at stitching people up.

Many of us will have had experience of someone being picked out for arrest or harassment because they were wearing a red top, had a purple mohican, or some other obvious means of identification. With videos being increasingly commonplace on demonstrations, used by the police, activists and animal abusers, anyone can be caught on camera and then picked up hours or even several months later by a police snatch squad. This tactic was used by the West Mercia police at the Consort Beagle demos, and has also been used at Hillgrove Cat Farm.

With videos present, it is obviously more important to mask up as well as wear identical clothing.

I would like to suggest specifically that people wear all-black clothing on demonstrations. There are a number of reasons why black is a better choice than others. Some sab groups for example, all wear blue boiler suits or all wear camouflage gear.

Black clothes are easy to come by, most people already have them lying around. It is also very difficult to distinguish black clothes from each other. Combat gear can vary a lot from person to person; different shades of green, some people wear all green, others camouflage style. If you have ever been sabbing, you can easily recognise sabs who are masked up, from what combat gear they are wearing or what shade of green their trousers are. On the other hand, sabs dressed head to toe in black are virtually impossible to identify when masked up. It has even been known for police to identify activists on video by the colour of their socks!

For new activists, they probably won't have any combat clothes or won't feel comfortable wearing them, as they can seem macho and militaristic. They will probably feel all right in black and it could be promoted as wearing black 'in memory of the animals that have died', etc.

Some people might feel that their individuality is being taken away by wearing a kind of 'uniform'. This is just a tactic, however; the time to express your individuality is not on demonstrations where people can be (and often are) arrested and sent to jail.

Others may reason that as they are not going to do anything that could be construed as unlawful, they don't need to wear black. This is definitely not the case. If the only people to wear black were those intending to 'kick ass', the police would obviously just target those individuals. In this scenario, wearing black would become a liability, not a protection. So the tactic of wearing black depends on the majority of the demonstrators present adhering to it. Often on demos, following an 'incident', the police will be trying to identify those responsible. If the crowd is all in black, anyone worried about being arrested can easily merge in with them.

Some sabs may also argue that camouflage gear enables them to remain unseen in wooded areas. This may be so, but black is also very good for merging into the background, especially when it gets dark, and can be used in urban as well as wooded environments.

Who will protect the Earth from the scum of the Universe?

Arkangel 19

A suggested black dress code for sabs and demos is:

- Black zip-up hooded top (with NO logos on it). These are good for hiding hair styles which are another easily identifiable characteristic.
- Plain black hat (often sold in army surplus shops).
- Black combat trousers (the extra pockets can be useful for sabbing) or black jeans
- or black jogging bottoms (although these three can obviously be distinguished between from videos).
- Black boots or all-black trainers (with no logos, trims, etc).
- Black socks (possibly going too far but better safe than sorry!).

Also avoid long colourful clothes worn underneath outer black clothing that will peek out and identify you.

For masking up:

A black balaclava is often used, especially by sabs, which can be rolled up into a hat when not in use. This can be good when the idea is to look menacing and threatening, although some activists are moving away from balaclavas for various reasons. If you get arrested, having a balaclava in your possession, although not illegal, can look bad for you in court. Others feel that when the media is present, they can focus on this and ignore the animal abuse. (Although promoting an aggressive image to the press can be a useful tactic on occasions.)

One alternative, which can be just as effective, is to use a plain black scarf tied around the lower half of the face. This can be worn in the usual manner when not in use.

Another useful idea is to cut the sleeves off an old black T-shirt. These are usually just the right size to wear as a mask to cover the nose and mouth. It has the added benefits of being easier to breathe through than a scarf and of staying in place more easily. (scarves have a tendency to slip down at inopportune moments!) When not in use it can be worn around the neck as a 'light scarf'.

Remember when wearing masks that they are useless if you put them on or take them off whilst being videoed.

A tactic that can be used if you suspect the police are looking for you is to remove masks, hats, etc (out of police view) and put on a brightly coloured jumper. The police will then be looking for someone dressed in black and hopefully won't hassle you. Swapping clothes can also be used to good effect.

Remember how similar the police all look when they are in riot gear. They know that by all dressing the same and removing ID numbers they can beat us around and get away with it. We can learn from their tactics.

...or do they?

The Men in Black

by Pooh Bear

It is unlikely that you have attended a demo in recent times and not come across the Men in Black (you know, the defenders of the State, and what a state we're in!).

They are easily identifiable. They wear black baseball caps, black combat jackets, black combat trousers tucked into black combat boots. Other accessories include video cameras, madonna-style microphones and cameras with very long lenses. Whether you are in a group of two or a crowd of two thousand they are there clicking and filming away; "who is talking to who", "just because they are wearing scarves and hoods doesn't mean we don't recognise their eyes", etc, etc.

Well, I'm sure that it has occurred to most animal liberation campaigners that they must be doing something with all these hundreds of hours of mostly tedious footage but exactly what? Just think, your average animal liberation campaigner, who attends almost all national and local demos must have been filmed countless number of times and all these images are being stored away somewhere. Unlike some road-speed cameras, I am sure that the cameras used by the Men in Black do actually contain film. What is also a bit odd about these defenders of the Universe against 'anarchist scum' is the fact that they also film people's dogs! Oh well, whatever turns them on.

The NIGHTMARE

for McDONALDS

Continues...

The McLibel case was described by Mike Mansfield QC as "the trial of the century as it concerns the most important issues that any of us have to face living our ordinary lives." And according to Channel Four News "It will go down in history as the most expensive and disastrous public relations exercise ever mounted by a multinational company." It was a victory for campaigners as the judge slammed McDonald's core business practices, evidence in the trial backed up all the criticisms made of the company, and the campaign became unstoppable. And it's not over yet. Appeals are in progress, and the McLibel Campaign is calling for a Day of Action on the anniversary of the judge's verdict (see below).

The Judge found as a fact that McDonald's "exploit children" through their advertising, that they are "culpably responsible" for cruelty to animals, and that the company is anti-Union and pays such low wages that it helps to depress the already low wages in the catering industry even further. The Judge also found that McDonald's food is not nutritious and that they are therefore deceiving the public when they promote it as such, and that they are risking the health of their long-term regular customers.

UK LIBEL LAWS TO BE CHALLENGED IN EUROPE

The McLibel Defendants (Helen Steel & Dave Morris) are appealing in the British courts against the parts of the Judge's verdict which went against them and over some of the disturbing legal aspects of the case - it is scheduled to be heard in December 1998 or later. Helen & Dave intend to take the British government to the European Court of Human Rights to overturn the UK's unfair and oppressive libel laws - challenging the denial of Legal Aid and the right to a jury trial, and laws stacked in favour of Plaintiffs. They will argue that multinational corporations should no longer be allowed to sue for libel.

BOOK

Updated editions of the book "McLibel: Burger Culture on Trial" written by John Vidal (with the help of the Defendants) are now available in paperback in the UK, hardback in the USA, and in some other countries. The paperback is also available by mail order at the special rate of £5 (including postage) from the McLibel Campaign.

CD-ROM

The McSpotlight Internet website (www.mcspotlight.org) was set up to provide comprehensive information worldwide at a push of a button about McDonald's, the trial and the campaign. It has been accessed nearly 30 million times since its launch in February 1996. A CD-ROM of the website (containing over 20,000 pages of information) is now available. It includes all the official court transcripts (313 days), witness statements from both sides, the full judgement, in-depth interviews with key characters and witnesses, over 500 press articles, and resources for campaigners including of course the "What's Wrong With McDonald's?" leaflets, now translated into more than a dozen languages and ready to be printed off. Other attractions include a guided tour (with audio from the McLibel Defendants), photo album, quiz, animation, video clips, stuff for sale, cartoons, pages for kids, two full-length plays, suppressed material from McDonald's previous legal actions, and 28 other companies in the McSpotlight. To order a copy of the McSpotlight CD, please send a donation of £7 to BM McSpotlight, London WC1N 3XX (cheques payable to "McLibel Support Campaign").

DOCUMENTARY ON VIDEO

The hour-long exclusive documentary "McLibel: Two Worlds Collide" is now available on video. Filmed over three years, with courtroom reconstructions directed by Ken Loach, it tells the inside story of Helen and Dave's epic battle, examining the main issues in the trial (nutrition, advertising, employment, animals, environment) as well as the implications for freedom of speech. Watch it on the internet at: www.spanner.org/mclibel/ or order a copy from One-Off Productions: £12.99 (waged) or £9.99 (unwaged) plus £2 postage to BM Oops, London WC1N 3XX (cheques payable to 'One-Off Productions'). Tel. 0171 247 8881. "A very brave film. The characters of Helen Steel and Dave Morris emerge triumphantly. No wonder the main TV channels dare not show it." - Ken Loach

McLIBEL ANNIVERSARY DAY OF ACTION - 19th JUNE 1998

One Year After The Verdict, and the Two Worlds Continue To Collide...

A day for local leafleting and protests, and showings (and burials!) of the 'McLibel' documentary.

McDonald's continues to expand. The campaign against them continues to grow. And the 'McLibel' Trial, the longest and one of the most controversial in English history, still shines as an example of how the business practices of a huge multinational can be exposed to public view, despite oppressive and unfair censorship laws. The hour-long documentary 'McLibel: Two Worlds Collide' tells the inside story of the case. Filmed over three years, with courtroom reconstructions directed by Ken Loach and exclusive access to the defendants' lives, it would clearly make a very popular peak-time documentary. But two proposed UK transmissions were blocked by lawyers at the BBC and Channel 4 and the film is currently available only on video and on the internet. Broadcasts in other countries are currently being negotiated.

As Appeals to the UK courts and the European Court are being prepared, the McLibel Support Campaign calls for international leafleting protests, and local showings of the documentary around Friday June 19th 1998 (one year since the trial verdict was delivered and our Victory Day of Action was celebrated by the distribution of half a million leaflets in about 20 countries). To protest at UK media censorship and burial of the documentary, we call on activists to organise local burials (at appropriate key sites) of the tape as a time capsule to ensure that generations to come will have a chance to know some of what happened during this historic battle.

ADOPT-A-STORE

The 'Adopt-a-Store' network in the UK is continuing - you can adopt your local UK McDonald's store(s) pledging to leaflet outside on the McLibel Anniversary Day Of Action (taking place this year) and on 16th October every year (World Anti-McDonald's Day). In this way, we will ensure that as many stores are covered as possible. Over 500 of McDonald's 750 UK stores were leafleted on the 'Victory Day of Action' (21st June 1997). People can adopt stores or can be put in touch with campaigners in their area, and can order leaflets in bulk, by contacting Veggies in Nottingham (Tel 0115 958 5666) or the McLibel Campaign (Tel 0171 713 1269).

Val Waters

Val Waters, a dedicated campaigner for animal protection and one of the first animal rights prisoners, died earlier this year at the age of 65.

In the 70s Val was a prominent anti-bloodsports campaigner and it was in connection with this that she was sent to prison in 1977.

As a member of the Hunt Saboteurs Association, Val was trying to stop the Atherstone Hunt from killing foxes when she was violently attacked and her car damaged by hunt thugs. The thugs were later taken to court and bound over to keep the peace, but the magistrates decided to bind Val over too, even though she hadn't broken the law.

As a matter of principle Val refused to accept the binding over order and was eventually sentenced to 28 days imprisonment for her refusal. Her case received some very positive national publicity and the sentence didn't deter her in any way from taking action against hunting.

As well as her anti-bloodsports activities, Val gave a great deal of help and support to ALF activists in the Birmingham area and campaigned on a wide range of animal rights issues.

Towards the end of last year Val was diagnosed as having cancer. She had been a vegetarian for many years, but was unfortunately never able to give up smoking, a factor which contributed significantly towards her illness. Although Val realised this herself, she remained philosophical about her situation and refused to get downhearted.

Val continued to fight against animal abuse and to take part in protests (especially against live exports) for as long as she could, but eventually she became too ill to attend demonstrations and turned, instead, to letter-writing.

Sadly Val's illness became progressively worse and on the 24th of February she bravely and sensibly took her own life rather than endure the suffering and indignity of cancer's final stages.

She will be remembered with fondness and admiration by many in the animal rights movement.

RITUAL an appeal from VIVA! SLAUGHTER

The greatest source of animal abuse is farming and slaughter, with more than 750 million animals killed every year in the UK alone, most of them factory farmed. VIVA! has amassed a body of evidence which shatters the deceit that somehow the slaughter of animals is clean, pain-free, compassionate and acceptable.

Ritual religious slaughter is the worst of all - both unjustified and indefensible. VIVA! has produced a detailed report on the subject - VIVA! Report on the Religious (Ritual) Slaughter of Animals. It will be followed by an equally damning report on mainstream slaughter.

Religions can and do change - the introduction of Shechita and Halal methods centuries ago is proof of that. Religious slaughter has been bolstered with myths. One is that the animals die instantly. Calves struggle to get up for over six minutes and continue breathing for nearly 12 minutes. Lambs can gasp for four minutes - seven in the case of bulls. Any animals struggling for life for this length of time with its throat cut feels terror and pain. The claim that stunning will prevent blood from draining out is also untrue. It makes no difference to the amount lost.

Religious slaughter has become big business. Thousands of animals are killed for export and for the general home market and a considerable amount of flesh is sold to the general public. Whether it be as a result of Halal or Shechita slaughter, it is not labelled as having been ritually killed.

An Animal and Ecological Disaster

by Emilie E:son (Press Officer for the DBF)

A nameless, unknown group or individual released 8000 mink from two fur farms in Svenljunga, Boras in Southern Sweden late last year.

Mink are not natural Swedish animals and to release 8000 is nothing short of animal abuse and an ecological disaster.

Already many of the mink have been run over and killed by cars and as a result of their release subsequently cannot find any food. Local wildlife is seriously threatened when a large number of carnivorous animals are suddenly released into their environment.

According to the DBF's (the equivalent of the ALF) guidelines, "Activists must take all necessary precautions against harming any animal, human or otherwise."

The people/person responsible for the release of the mink cannot be serious animal-rights activists, but people who do not care for animals and who stand to damage the animal rights movement. The DBF strongly condemns these kinds of actions.

Demo at Wickham Laboratories

On the 20th September 97 about 300 protesters gathered in Wickham to join the annual demonstration against Wickham Research Laboratories. These are contract testing laboratories similar to the ones at Huntingdon, but smaller. Nevertheless, thousands of animals are used there every year, the lab doing the dirty work for the multi-nationals who would prefer that their clients did not know that their products were tested on animals. The demonstration was organised with the help of the newly-formed Southern Animal Rights Coalition (SARC), and was in support of Barry Horne's hunger strike and the campaign against vivisection.

For once, demonstrators outnumbered the police, and were able to march through the village and up along the main road. People then gathered in the square to listen to some excellent speakers.

Pauline Dibley, Chairperson for Southampton Animal Concern, warned of the horrors yet to come in the world of medical science, as bit by bit our rights to decide what treatment we receive on the NHS will be eroded and our bodies will become the property of the medical profession.

Chris Isles, a former student at Portsmouth Polytechnic, described his experience working as an animal technician at Charing Cross and Westminster Medical School and the Institute of Neurology, and pointed out that all the "Codes of Practice" so widely publicised by the Home Office as providing protection for the animals were widely ignored.

John Curtin spoke of the camp which had been set up at Huntingdon Research Centre and the effect that it had on the workers there.

Robin Webb, ALF Press Officer, a brave man for returning to Hampshire after all the hassle he has had to endure by the "Hampshire Loonies" (as he describes them), was videoed by these same "loonies" throughout his entire speech. Robin suggested that, should his arch-oppressor Desmond Thomas go through with medical treatment for his ulcers, he may well suffer serious side-effects!

Dr Tony Page once again impressed upon the crowd the need to learn the facts about vivisection and to be aware of the uselessness of animal experiments from a scientific point of view. His own feeling that it is morally wrong to use animals for vivisection is as strong as ever, and his admiration for those who rescued animals was echoed by cheers and handclapping by all those present (bar the "loonies").

After the speeches, wreathes and flowers were laid at the fencing surrounding the laboratories, and a minute's silence was observed in memory of all the animals who have suffered and died there in cruel experiments.

When protesters returned to their vehicles some of them decided to end the day by paying a visit to three well known places of animal-abuse which come under the auspices of the Director of Wickham Laboratories, William Cartmell. His chicken sheds at Torbay Farm just a few miles up the road house hundreds of hens kept in sterile buildings where 'Pathogen Free' eggs are produced to be used for testing vaccines. Winchester Council have now granted Mr. Cartmell permission to use some of the buildings for an extension of the work carried out at Wickham Laboratories. A large number of protesters drove to this site, closely followed by 4 police vans and numerous outriders, who formed a cordon around the area. As there was not much doing there, the protesters decided to visit Garetmar Kennels nearby, where pedigree puppies are bred in 'puppy farm' conditions - Cartmell is their vet. This place was protected by a handful of police, so the next stop was 'Binghams', Cartmell's large red brick mansion of tasteless proportions, surrounded by open fields. There were no police this time but Cartmell and family were away anyhow - oh well.

The day was deemed a success by all those who attended and many thanks go out to SARC for helping to make the day such a success.

Consort Beagles

by Pat Brookes

Should I feel a little uneasy about vast amounts of animal welfare money being paid out for the 'saving' of the Consort beagles? Surely not. If we follow our hearts and our compassionate instincts, yes of course there is no doubt these innocent animals' safety must be secured. As individuals, doesn't each of those dogs have a right to be saved from torture by any means available? It makes no difference to an abused animal whether its rescue has cost money or not, it simply needs help.

Comforting, lump in the throat stuff seeing all those lovely dogs exit Consort, destined for lives as loved pets. Seems pretty clear cut that the right thing was done wasn't it? So why can't I feel soothed and content instead of feeling a disturbing niggles working away inside me?

What if emotions are put on hold, and the situation looked at in greater depth? It's time that some of the money was only made available to welfare especially because of those beagles - but a huge amount more has been used from general 'animal owned' funds, much of it borrowed and costing interest.

I understand the argument that we can't save everything, and the plight of these particular animals was put in front of us (us meaning the A/R welfare movement), so we did what was necessary to help them instead of others, a sort of first-come first-served basis, it sounds fair.

Agreed, the Consort breeders were closing down, so they weren't being paid welfare money just to directly replace 'bought out' animals, but those beagles were bred because there was a market for them in vivisection labs. That market need didn't disappear just because those particular beagles were bought out of danger. Those labs that Consort would have ultimately supplied will now turn to other vivisection breeders who will have to supply the immediate Consort shortfall. Even more bitches will have to go through the breeding mill to give birth to doomed pups, who in their turn will have to spend their puppyhood in barren, sterile, loveless confinement before their real torture even begins.

In short, the rescued dogs had already suffered that part of their sentence but their release means another batch of dogs has to go through the process from scratch. You may not have been able to look a Consort dog in the eye and say, "Sorry, you'll have to be sold on to suffer or be put down, I can't rescue you because overall it's not cost effective", but can you look one of the specially bred replacement dogs in another breeders kennels in the eye and say, "Sorry about this, I've made it necessary for you to supply a laboratory's shortfall, but don't worry we saved the dog who would have gone in your place, and it only cost us a few hundred pounds of money given for animal welfare, to put you here instead."?

What I'm getting at, is in cases where there is a moral dilemma and whichever way we jump only makes a difference to which animals suffer, not to how many, don't we have an obligation as guardians of the animals' purse strings, to spend their money in a way which helps as many of them as possible yet benefits the abusers the least?

When Consort went under, as with any failed business, the receivers job was to make Consort claw back as much money as possible to pay the company's creditors - that is, all those firms who have supplied Consort with the goods they needed to exist in their dirty business.

Of course they (Consort) wanted the dogs to be bought by animal welfare. That way they could demand full market value of £250 per dog instead of either having to accept knockdown prices from other firms, or pay out thousands to get all the animals euthanized and cremated, leaving even less money to be paid out to creditors. Did we really have to help Consort sort out its financial obligations to its equally guilty suppliers? They must have been laughing at us all the way to the bank. Although adoption money will probably cover further neutering costs and vaccination costs, I doubt other donations will begin to cover the basic £28,000 outlay, enough incidentally to neuter 560 strays or feed 186 for a whole year.

It isn't just the money, how about from a sanctuary angle? Doesn't the taking in of all these pedigree dogs mean that each one will take the home that an existing less attractive stray could have had? Won't other re-homing everywhere be on hold, leaving present strays in kennels for much longer, and won't sanctuaries be unable to take in as many other desperate cases in the meanwhile because of lack of space and funds? Won't destruction policy-run rescues be forced to kill more dogs because of the gridlock.

Could it be that at the end of the day we have spent vast amounts of animals' money in a way that has yes, definitely comforted a bit of the pain of our compassion (who didn't feel a satisfying glow when the dogs first walked out?) but has also helped Consort and their cronies out of a hole, has involved substituting one animal's suffering for another's, and has had unwelcome side-effects on other rescue work? Might not it be that we've simply been manipulated by a vivisection company in a jam?

I hasten to say I'm criticising no one in A/R's motives, I know the rescuing has come about through the purest love for animals. Neither am I saying my views are necessarily right, it's just that usually I can see and, more importantly, justify both sides of an issue, this time I need help so that maybe I can bury my niggling doubts. Any offers?

SPANNA

PROTECTING ANIMALS ABROAD

The Society for the Protection of Animals Abroad (SPANNA)'s action is twofold: immediate treatment for wounds, crippled feet and under-nourishment; and education for animal owners and children - which we strongly believe is the only hope for the future.

There is no fixed membership fee to SPANNA and any regular donation will ensure you receive their magazine and bulletin four times a year.

There are some 38 million working donkeys, mules and horses in North Africa alone. Their lives are hard, toiling long hours in scorching sun, ploughing, carrying their owners, drawing water and carrying the burden of man's ignorance, often callousness. SPANNA's role is also important in teaching the owners of animals the mutual benefits of taking care of their animals and relieving those animals by offering rest, aid and recovery from sickness and injury.

SPANNA have been helping animals abroad for the past 75 years and are extremely grateful for the voluntary help they have received during the course of this time - needless to say that they are always in need of help. Some 300,000 animals a year are given treatment, rest and refuge by SPANNA.

NATIONAL ANTI-HUNT CAMPAIGN

The NAHC will be continuing its campaigns against bloodsports, despite the decision not to give Mike Foster's Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill the parliamentary time it needs to become law.

On March 13, the day that the bill finally ran out of time, several members were forcibly escorted (one being slightly injured in the process) from the House of Commons after they read, from the public gallery, from a letter in which Blair made his specific promise to give time to an anti-hunting bill should that be the wish of most MPs.

Recent NAHC planning meetings have resulted in a slight change of direction in NAHC campaigning, with increased emphasis in future being placed on non-violent civil disobedience as a campaign strategy. Several new campaigns are being planned, as is a march for later in the year. Anyone wanting to be kept informed should ask to be included on the group's mailing list; a donation would be appreciated towards the costs of mailouts.

The National Anti-Hunt Petition continues, and has been slightly amended to take account of the failure of Mike Foster's bill.

A new leaflet is also being written, and copies of both are available from:

C.A.L.F.

by Robin Lane

The Campaign Against Leather & Fur (CALF) was formed in 1989 with the primary intention of drawing people's attention to the fact that leather and fur are basically the same thing - the skin of murdered animals. Consequently, we believed that if people were not prepared to wear fur then they should not be prepared to wear leather either. Up until this point the animal rights movement (except for some direct action groups), had largely turned a blind eye to the issue of leather, writing it off as "just a by-product of the meat industry". CALF set about putting the record straight by pointing out that the leather trade is, by all accounts, a massive multi-million pound industry. After all, the meat and leather industries stand hand-in-hand with one another and both deserve equal attention.

At first, we found it difficult convincing people that it was a worthy cause but the group were determined to spread the message far and wide and set about producing leaflets, posters (courtesy of Veggies), cards, stickers, T-shirts and fact sheets. As only two people were running the group it seemed like an uphill struggle, especially as some animal rights organisations and individuals were actually derisory regarding the campaign. Then interest came from some unlikely quarters; Ms. London magazine produced an article about CALF and Radio Kent featured the group on one of their broadcasts. We started being invited to give talks at various animal rights groups meetings around the country and at last people were showing interest in the campaign.

In 1990, CALF extended its campaign to cover the abuse involved in the production of wool and silk. Most of the information that we used in our leaflets and fact sheets came from the Vegan Society but they did not have the resources, at that time, to specifically campaign on individual issues so CALF filled a very necessary space regarding the promotion of veganism. In 1989, the only company selling a wide range of non-leather footwear were Heartland Products in the USA but shortly after CALF was set up, Mocotan started their business in the UK and discovered that people were waiting for a company to supply them with non-leather products. Hot on the heels of Mocotan came several more companies - Ethical Wares being the one to bridge the gap between running a business and campaigning against the leather trade at the same time.

In 1991, CALF designed a T-shirt featuring the names of numerous animal rights organisations and groups under the heading of 'Animal Liberation - A Common Cause'. As it was just about to be printed, the anti-fur group LYNX got wind of the fact that their name was to appear on the same T-shirt as the ALF! Horror of horrors!!

After threatening CALF with legal action should they proceed, we altered the design and only featured genuine animal liberation groups instead. The shirt proved very popular.

It has always been a misconception that CALF is a single issue group. In fact, ever since 1989 we have included leaflets about hunting, vivisection, the meat industry, circuses, angling and numerous other issues in our information packs. The vast majority of those writing in to us for information are young people and we find this very encouraging.

During the first couple of years, CALF organised a number of protests outside leather retailers in Central London, including the World of Leather, and were planning to organise a march to show the general public how easy it is to be vegan by asking those attending to only wear non-animal products.

In July 1991, tragedy struck CALF to the core. Ros Dadej, co-founder, was killed in a road accident whilst cycling. For the next few years, the 'group' consisting of one person, continued to send out information packs and kept things ticking over. In 1994, CALF organised another day of action in Central London and a handful of protesters distributed anti-leather leaflets in several shoe shops and made their presence known outside a number of leather retailers, the staff of one actually threatening physical violence. Each time there have been protests outside leather stores, the owners have shown violent tendencies. It must have something to do with their working environment!

By 1995, our articles had appeared in various magazines including Arkangel, The Vegan, Greenscene and Greenline. Vegan Views were advertising the group and the breakthrough came when the Vegan Society co-produced a leaflet with CALF entitled 'The Leather Issue'. Although, it must be said, the leather issue still hadn't attracted the animal rights movement to any great extent, the opportunity for people to obtain information about the leather trade is increasing. It is understandable that people find campaigning against the leather trade a daunting task! After all, practically everyone wears or uses leather products. Soon after CALF was formed we found comfort with other 'fringe' groups such as The Campaign Against Angling, who at that time were also considered 'a bit extreme'. Well, when the fur trade bites the dust once and for all, the next obvious target is the leather trade. At least the ground will have been laid so that the campaigning tools are in place.

CALF NEWS

CALF has recently produced its own 'CALF NEWS' which contains fact sheets covering issues where the information is difficult to come by. These include wool, silk, eggs, tanneries and the leather trade, honey, shellac, pate de foie gras, ostrich farming, a list of groups campaigning against the fur trade and a comprehensive list of non-leather retailers. CALF News is available on receipt of a 31p stamp.

Footnote: As previously stated, the campaign against the leather trade has been a mixture of frustration, personal loss and, for the first few years, an uphill struggle. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the people who have helped CALF over the years: Dave for the articles, Lyn and Maggie for the illustrations, Mark for the free photocopying, Veggies and London Vegans for their generous support, Alison for answering all the letters and Ros, for having the vision in the first place.

Feral Cats

by Elizabeth Shaw

I was appalled to read in a recent issue of ARCNEWS that feral cats are being destroyed if homes cannot be found for them. Surely A/R campaigners should not be killing any animal unless it has met with a near fatal accident or is suffering great pain due to illness? To simply discard feral cats due to lack of homes means that the rescuers involved have, to my mind, sunk to RSPCA and CPL methods of control no matter what their policies say.

Recently, I too have heard one or two rumours within the movement that it is better to put unwanted animals down rather than let them rot in a cage. What nonsense! Really good rescue centres exercise their dogs daily and let cats wander at will during the day before putting them back into properly equipped safe cages at night. Rescued feral cats too need only stay in small pens until they respond to humans, or start to walk forward to greet the carer. With regular food and kindness this need not take very long - in some cases just a matter of days.

During the past 20 years I have met many very successful feral cat rescuers but just now and again, however willing, a misfit turns up. These people cannot or will not cope with feral cats - the sort of person who finds the work so difficult or exhausting that they need plenty of holidays. They make plans to clear out all the animals under their care at certain times of the year for rests. These rescuers are very difficult to detect when collecting up animals because they smile sweetly, appear very efficient and are full of sympathy for poor suffering animals. It very often turns out though that they have already worked for one of the large nationals and have become accustomed to 'sorting' cats for euthanasia. I say this because had they first taken advice from Cat Action Trust 1977 (PO Box 1639, London W8 4RY) they would never have thought of destruction in the first place.

Good solid information is available on feral cat care/homing so why don't they make use of it? Are they killing neutered cats? I think that anyone caught taking feral cats to the vet or elsewhere for euthanasia should be named in order to prevent other cats suffering from the same callous fate. That applies to other animals.

LONDON ANIMAL ACTION NEWS

LAA have continued to be very active since the last issue - involved in a wide range of campaigns in London and around the country.

FUR TRADE

Fur Free London continues to be the focus of regular activity for LAA, with London's remaining fur shops being picketed 3 or 4 times a week and home visits to directors and employees. Recent successes include the closure of one of only two fur shops that opened on Saturdays following sustained close attention from LAA over the years. Zwirns left its prime site in Mayfair for an office with no shop front; this leaves only Philip Hockley on Conduit Street to fly the flag for the fur trade on Saturdays. A secondhand clothes shop in Chelsea, Steinberg & Tolkein, had been selling fur coats until LAA carried out a few demonstrations. They very quickly caved in and, in fact, handed over the remaining fur coats to the activists to dispose of. LAA members have also supported anti-fur demos at mink farms around the country.

VIVISECTION INDUSTRY

Events in London have included home visits to some of the directors and employees of Huntingdon Life Sciences who live in the city, and regular leafleting of Co-op banks. Individuals in LAA also played an active role in supporting Camp Rena at HLS last year. LAA members have also helped the Hillgrove campaign by participating in weekday pickets of the few remaining workers. In January, London played host to one of Prof. Colin Blakemore's lectures. LAA demonstrated both outside and inside the lecture hall, causing the talk to be disrupted for some time. The evil Blakemore later came in for some close personal attention when activists physically attacked him, however, he decided not to press any charges.

ACTIONS

Many individuals in LAA are active hunt saboteurs who maintain close links between animal rights and London's hunt sab groups. LAA held a series of demos in central London, outside the Houses of Parliament where MPs were lobbied, at Downing Street and the Labour Party HQ, in the run up to the second reading of the Foster Bill. Also, a demo was held at the meeting point in London for the bloodsports enthusiasts attending the Countryside Alliance march.

The week of action against John Lewis in February saw LAA members participate in home visits to three of the company directors who reside in London. The flagship store on Oxford Street was picketed as was the John Lewis Company HQ in Central London.

MEAT TRADE

LAA have been involved in a campaign to prevent the opening of a chicken slaughterhouse in Peckham, South London. A series of demos at council meetings and a sustained campaign by local activists has increased the pressure on the council who now look likely not to grant planning permission after all. Other members continue to dedicate much of their time to the live export issue and demonstrations have continued outside MAFF HQ in Whitehall. LAA members have also attended live export demos in Dover and at the farm of haulier Stephen Woods.

OFFICE / STALLS

LAA have had their own office since Jan 97 which is staffed on a daily basis by volunteers. The group holds regular stalls around London which educate the public and encourages people to get actively involved in the struggle for animal liberation. LAA produce the increasingly popular London Animal Rights News (LARN) with a growing international readership! They hold an open meeting on the second Tuesday of the month at the 1a Community Centre, 1a Rosebery Avenue, London EC1. Subscription to LARN costs £5 per year (conc. £3).

Price £3.

Published in 1993 by Campaign Against Fraudulent Medical Research, Australia. Exposes the massive fraud in drug testing that ensures the survival and proliferation of this very dangerous but profitable industry. (40 page booklet).

Animal Experimentation: A Harvest of Shame

Dr Moneim Fadali MD. Price £15.

This is an extremely powerful book. It is a strong statement, not only on the question of animal experimentation, but also on our attitudes and treatment of others on this planet. The author is highly qualified to speak on animal experimentation and gives a wealth of examples demonstrating its uselessness and harm to humans, as well as the resulting loss of valuable cures.

Vivisection Unveiled

Tony Page Dlit. Price £6.99.

This is a thoroughly researched book, assiduously presenting scientific evidence that animal experimentation is not only of no value to medicine but that it is also actually dangerous (much of the evidence from the mouths of the vivisectioners themselves). His book is most informative and well-referenced and is suitable for both the lay person and those with a scientific background.

After Noah - Animals and the Liberation of Theology

a new book

by Andrew Linzey & Dan Cohn-Sherbock

Are animals there to be cuddled and protected? Slaughtered and eaten? Sacrificed to the Gods? The way we treat animals is one of the most pressing moral issues of our time. The authors of this book claim that it is - and always has been a theological and spiritual issue as well.

And yet the idea that animals are here for human use is firmly entrenched in Western thinking. It is part of a whole anthropocentric world-view which relates to a creator-God whose prime concern is the welfare and interests of the human species. As a result, the Judaeo-Christian tradition is often blamed for justifying the abuse of animals.

This fine and detailed work is the first comprehensive study of Jewish and Christian teaching about animals. In 'After Noah', Dan Cohn-Sherbock and Andrew Linzey show how Jews and Christians have often failed to take account of the power of their traditions to promote a more compassionate and sensitive regard for animals. It argues that the way we treat animals is a benchmark of the kind of society we are, and that in recognising the intrinsic value of animals, we can liberate ourselves from the idolatry which is to be found at the heart of much contemporary spirituality.

Reverend Professor Andrew Linzey holds the world's first post in theology and animal welfare - the IFAW Senior Research Fellowship at Mansfield College, Oxford.

Rabbi Professor Dan Cohn-Sherbok is Professor of Judaism at the University of Wales in Lampeter.

THE L-PLATE VEGAN

a new guide from VIVA!

In today's climate of ethical thinking and health awareness, veganism is flourishing amongst all age groups. No longer seen as lentil-munching weirdoes, vegans enjoy a healthy, cruelty-free and ethical lifestyle, with not even a hint of martyrdom!

VIVA! has produced a new booklet entitled "The L-Plate Vegan". It's not a vegan cook-book but a simple, everyday guide to rustling up vegan fare from mainstream shops and supermarkets. With not a sign of denial or deprivation, "The L-Plate Vegan" takes a hedonistic, stomach-rumbling, mouth-watering journey through fantastic foods all readily available in High Street or even the corner shop.

The L-Plate Vegan sets the taste-buds tingling with smashing sausages and super soya products, it pauses to peruse pies and pasta, races around rice dishes, gets saucy with soups and salads before tackling tasty treats and diving into divine desserts. If all this sounds too hectic, you can just relax at the ready-made meal section or take hints on how to find fab food while you're out and about.

With sections on nutrition and health, toiletries and cosmetics as well as drinks, shoes and clothes, this is a great guide for those taking their first faltering vegan steps.

ANIMAL LIBERATION PRISONERS

Arkangel gives its full support to animal liberation prisoners. We list only the names of prisoners and ask people to contact the ALFSG for up-to-date information, prison numbers and addresses. This is because Arkangel Magazine is produced less frequently than the ALFSG information and could be out of date by the time you read it.

Uncaged : Campaigns Update...

Day of Action against Proctor & Gamble

On Saturday 28th March there was a national day of action against the multinational company Proctor & Gamble. Each year, Proctor & Gamble are responsible for the torture and death of thousands of animals in painful and unnecessary product testing - the true figure, of course, is a well-kept secret. Demonstrations all over the country took place outside supermarkets and shops which sell Proctor & Gamble products. Campaigners collected signatures on the boycott pledges and gave out information about other products which people could buy that don't involve tests on animals.

Proctor & Gamble produce the following products (for a full list contact Uncaged):

Daz, Bounce, Pampers, Fairy Liquid, Sinex, Crest toothpaste, Oil of Ulay and Bold.

You can get in touch with Proctor & Gamble to let them know why you won't be purchasing their products at the following address:

The Manifesto for Life: Animal Experiments, Medicine & Society

The Manifesto for Life is a 16 page pamphlet which offers a wide-ranging and incisive critique of animal experimentation. By placing animal experimentation in an historical, social and economic context, it is possible to discern its fatal scientific and ethical limitations. Thus we can also see the function that animal experiments fulfil in modern society. This is a function that has little to do with promoting health, and much to do with enhancing the power and profits of corporations, and the medical establishments which effectively act on their behalf.

The Manifesto for Life is a unique publication - a watershed in the progress of the animal rights and anti-vivisection movements - clearly demonstrating that respecting the non-human world is not only compatible with human flourishing, but fundamental to it. The pamphlet is available from Uncaged Campaigns for £2.00.

The Road to Victory

Compiled by Martin Masterman-Lister

After two years of campaigning, Brigitte Bardot has secured a ban on the annual rooster-slaughtering ritual in the Hungarian hamlet of Csurgonagymararton. (Times 2.9.1997)

The Guardian recently reported that "we share 98% of our genetic make-up" with pygmy chimpanzees. (Guardian 3.9.1997)

One of China's endangered pandas has given birth to healthy twins after a rare pregnancy in captivity. The twins were born last weekend at the Giant Panda Protection Research Centre in the Wolong Reserve in South Western Sichuan Province. (Independent 3.9.1997)

A breeding programme for the majestic red kite is much further advanced in Wales. Over the past eight years 269 birds have been released, the first breeding in 1992, 4 pairs raising 10 young. This year, 48 pairs raised 105 young in England and 19 pairs raised 38 young in Scotland. Poison and traps are used by ill-informed farmers and gamekeepers. An Oxfordshire farmer was fined £14,000 in May for his activities. (Guardian 3.9.1997)

Vultures were wiped out in the Alps in 1927, but incredibly, a new generation is on the way. Prince Sadruddin-aga-Khan has been working on a project for 10 years to bring them back from European zoos. A total of 72 vultures have been released into the Alps. (Guardian 3.9.1997)

Hillsdown Holdings, one of Britain's biggest food companies is to withdraw from producing red meat. (Times 5.9.1997)

After turning a blind eye, park rangers and police are finally pouncing on Italian parties who travel to neighbouring countries to shoot birds, often protected species, in their thousands. Police have begun raiding hunting parties and in a fortnight had caught three groups who preyed upon strictly protected birds. A study has found that the number of Italian men who admit to hunting has dropped from 2.8m to 800,000 in the last 20 years. It also found that Italian women do not find hunters attractive. (Guardian 12.9.1997)

Tesco's have agreed to make it clear which of its eggs come from battery hens. (Independent 16.9.1997)

For millions of overweight Americans the so-called 'Fen-Phen' drug cocktail had seemed like a silver bullet to get rid of their flab. Now, suddenly, they are being told that the drugs are life threatening. People are turning to the courts to sue the drug companies. (Independent 17.9.1997)

Government scientists are urging caution about the use of anti-malarial drug, Lariam, which has been linked with mental symptoms such as hallucinations. (Independent 19.9.1997)

A cow who survived 150ft fall off a cliff in North Wales and 24 hours in the Irish sea has been rescued by a life boat and a fishing vessel. (Guardian 20.9.1997)

The bird population in Britain has boomed over the past two years, according to a survey. Between 1994, when the breeding bird survey was established, and 1996, 36 of the more common species increased, 48 were stable and 15 declined in number. (Breeding bird survey £5 (01842 750050). (Independent 20.9.1997)

Conservationists yesterday claimed victory in the battle to save one of Britain's most important sites for toads and newts from being ploughed up. It is understood English Nature, which controls Sites of Special Scientific Interest is to draw up a new agreement with Justin Harmer, the farmer who owns Offham marshes, near Lewes, East Sussex. (Independent 20.9.1997)

Hopes for an easing of the EU's ban on British beef suffered a fresh setback yesterday after the EC said it had evidence that smuggled beef from the UK was getting into Germany. Brussels has asked the German authorities to order the closure of at least one meat plant. (Independent 24.9.1997)

A new government report states that meat eaters who eat more than 3 ounces of red meat a day, should cut down their consumption. (BBC 25.9.1997)

Sellafield has been fined for a chemical leak that killed 15,000 salmon, trout and eels and faces a fine and costs of £60,000. (Virgin Radio 26.9.1997)

Scientists at the CJD Surveillance Unit in Edinburgh have determined that 'new-variant' CJD, which has so far killed 20 young Britons, is caused by a 'single strain of infectious agent'. (Independent 26.9.1997)

A British animal rights campaigner who runs Fight Against Animal Cruelty in Europe, Vicky Moore, who was tossed and gored by a bull in Spain two years ago, has flown to protest against a series of bull fights in the Portuguese colony of Macao. In 1987, Mrs. Moore rescued Blackie the donkey from certain death in another Spanish street festival. (Independent on Sunday 28.9.1997)

Eradicating the food poisoning bug E.coli 0157 may take hundreds of years, Britain's leading expert in the field, Professor Hugh Pennington said yesterday. (Independent on Sunday 28.9.1997)

A pharmaceutical research group, American Pharmaceutical Research, whose clients included Bayer, Glaxo, Pfizer, Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, SmithKline Beecham and others, has admitted falsifying clinical data in trials of several drugs seeking US approval. An FDA spokesman said it was unlikely that the drugs now on the market would be recalled. (Observer 28.9.1997)

Ostriches held their heads higher when Tesco announced it was discontinuing sales of meat from exotic farm animals. (Observer 28.9.1997)

The scientist Hugh Pennington who investigated the deadly E.coli outbreak caused by contaminated meat in Scotland said yesterday that at least a third of uncooked chickens on sale were infected by campylobacter. This organism triggers gastroenteritis and can cause complications including paralysis. (Times 29.9.1997)

Matador Jose Antonio Iniesta was gored by a bull in Madrid's Las Ventas arena. The hospital reports him as being in a serious condition with a severe loss of blood. (Ipswich Evening Star 30.9.1997)

A woman animal rights protester was continuing to defy bailiffs attempts to remove her after spending her second night shut in a steel safe underground. The 24 year old woman, 'Greta', is the last of 20 demonstrators who occupied a camp in a small wood outside the gates of Huntingdon Life Sciences Chemical Research Centre, near Huntingdon, Cambs. (Independent 3.10.1997)

Tony Blair is being urged by two cabinet colleagues to set up an all-powerful judicial enquiry to pin the blame for new-variant CJD, the human BSE. They decided that the Government had a duty to track down those guilty of allowing BSE to be introduced into the human food chain, and subsequently covering up the evidence. (Independent 3.10.1997)

Australians have been warned against eating undercooked game meat, including kangaroo and wallaby, after doctors discovered what could be a new parasite spread to humans. (Independent 3.10.1997)

An air and sea search for four fisherman missing in the north sea was abandoned yesterday. (Independent 3.10.1997)

Soya products, fruit, vegetables and flax seed may ward off breast cancer, according to research. It is a diet that may turn out to be the strongest protective factor yet discovered against the disease. (Independent 3.10.1997)

The mistress of the late Paolo Gucci, grandson of the founder of the fashion empire, was banned yesterday from keeping horses for 5 years after admitting 11

charges of causing unnecessary suffering. Penny Armstrong, 28, the mother of two of Mr. Gucci's children, was ordered to pay costs of £5,640 and compensation totalling £15,570 to the RSPCA. (Independent 7.10.1997)

Former film star Olive McFarland, is today facing possible prosecution after RSPCA officers and police raided her farm at Fen Lane, Creeping St. Mary, after an anonymous tip-off. One foal was destroyed and at least 8 horses taken away from the farm which was used as a horse breeding and training centre. The horses were taken to the International League for the Protection of Horses Centre at Snetterton. (Evening Star 10.10.1997)

Five animal activists stormed into a top London restaurant to protest at an exhibition which included two skinned bulls heads by controversial artist, Damien Hirst, a court was told. Customers at Quo Vadis in Soho, run by Marco Pierre White, were sitting down to dinner when it was claimed 'mayhem' broke out. A painting was kicked, a vase broken and bin liners full of rubbish emptied across the floor. Niel Hansen, 30, Robin Lane, 42, and Brendan McNally, 35, were fined £200 with £200 costs over the incident last January. Melanie Gatty, 28, and Paul Gravett, 35, were bound over to keep the peace. (Independent 14.10.1997)

Five pairs of little egrets have become what are believed to be the first of their species to nest in Britain. (Times 17.10.1997)

Gary Shaw, Gary Pettopierre, Michael Holland and David Wragg were found guilty at Bakewell Magistrates Court, Derbyshire, of offences under the 1992 Protection of Badgers Act, which included digging out a badger and killing it. They were jailed yesterday for 5 months in the RSPCA's first badger case using DNA which showed blood stains on the men's clothing and a knife had come from the animal. Wragg and Holland were active members of field sports societies. The court ordered that dogs belonging to all the men be forfeited. Since 1986 there have been 271 convictions of badger offences by the RSPCA. (Independent 18.10.1997)

Billy Smart's big top provides the excitement of a traditional circus but is refreshingly free of animal acts. (For details: 0171 738 2488). (Guardian 21.10.1997)

The host of an 18th birthday party told a court yesterday how he used himself as a guinea pig to save the guests from eating meat infected with the deadly E.coli bacterium. He sampled meat from John Barr's butcher's shop in Wishaw, Lanarkshire, after hearing reports that it had been linked to what turned out to be Scotland's worst food-poisoning outbreak in which 20 people died. After several hours he was fine and so the party went ahead. A family relation also rang Mr. Barr and was told that by the butcher that only corned beef and chopped ham were affected. After the party many of the 106 guests fell ill. Mr. Barr, 52, is charged with "culpably, wilfully and recklessly" supplying meat, despite being warned by health officials not to sell any cooked meats. (Independent 22.10.1997)

Agribusiness is far more of a threat to wildlife than the fox, according to a new academic study at the University of Bristol. Their report says far that from being a threat, foxes can prove beneficial to some sectors of agriculture. They found that 70% of sheep farmers believed they lost no lambs to foxes, and 80% had no evidence of fox predation. (Independent on Sunday 26.10.1997)

The new anti-stalking law, frequently used against animal rights activists since its enactment in June this year, could for the first time be used by an animal welfare worker against a firm of livestock auctioneers. Georgina Kennedy of the welfare monitoring group Marketwatch, has been filming at an animal market in Bury St. Edmonds, Suffolk. She claims she was stalked by Alex Botting, a market employee, who retaliated to her filming by holding a video recorder inches from her face, tailing her around shops and even into a public lavatory. The Crown Prosecution Service is considering a criminal prosecution against Mr. Botting under the new stalking laws, and against Lacy Scott, the auctioneers, for aiding and abetting the offence. (Observer 26.10.1997)

A marshland that is home to England's only regular wintering flock of bean geese, as well as many rare insects and animals, was yesterday given special protection by English Nature. The Mid Yare reserve, five miles east of Norwich, is a haven for the beautiful swallowtail butterfly, the Norfolk hawker dragonfly and the otter. The 800-hectare site straddles both sides of the River Yare near Strumpshaw, Rockland, Buckenham and Cantley. Managed by the RSPB, the reserve's outstanding wildflower meadows, reedbeds, marshes, fens and woodlands are vital habitats for breeding birds, including the marsh harrier, kingfisher, barn owl and snipe. Thousands of geese, ducks and wading birds - including up to 7,000 widgeons winter on Buckenham Marshes. (Independent 28.10.1997)

After thousands of dolphins have been killed by drift nets, Britain has taken the initiative to outlaw their use by fishermen in a move that couldn't fail to be popular in the EU. (Independent 31.10.1997)

An opinion poll in rural areas has blown apart claims that banning hunting is an issue that rigidly divides the city from the country. The results of a MORI poll, which reveals that voters in the countryside would back a ban by a margin of two to one, will put the Government under pressure to support moves to ban fox hunting. The poll, based on a sample of 1,500 people in rural areas, found support of 57%. Two thirds of those polled also said they lived in areas where hunts took place. (Observer 2.11.1997)

800,000 signatures have been collected by CIWF on a petition calling a ban on live exports which will be delivered to Elliot Morley, animal welfare minister. (Independent 3.11.1997)

Doctors and diabetes sufferers are being warned that a drug that went on the market in Britain last month can cause liver damage in a small number of patients. Glaxo Wellcome, which markets the drug as Romozin, has advised doctors to test patients for adverse reactions. (Times 4.11.1997)

Hunt saboteurs threatened a big increase in their activities after the Government announced that it would not find time for a Private Member's Bill to stop fox hunting. Paul Gammon, spokesman for the hunt saboteurs said the decision would provide even more justification for disrupting fox hunts. (Times 4.11.1997)

The Indian Government is showing signs of bowing to the concerns of animal rights activists, in a country where large parts of the economy depend on overworked beasts of burden. The Government is tackling one of the most familiar and disturbing images of India: caged and often dying birds being carried around on the backs of bicycles by hawkers. India has reinforced a ban on bird trapping to save hundreds of exotic species. The Indian Wildlife Protection Act of 1972 was reinforced in 1990 to control the export of wild birds and has been recently extended to local trading of live birds. (Times 5.11.1997)

Welsh Secretary Ron Davies has given the go-ahead for a 1,000 acre wetland bird reserve on the Gwent levels near Newport. It will involve the creation of wet grasslands, saline lagoons and reedbeds. (Independent on Sunday 16.11.1997)

Eating nuts regularly may help you to prolong life. (Times 18.11.1997)

A retired vet, Warwick Seymour Hamilton, 58, has been found guilty of inflicting unnecessary suffering on his 118 pet rats. He was fined £300 for the offence and £150 for keeping illegal traps and ordered to pay costs of £1,922. (Orpington & Chiselhurst News Shopper 19.11.1997)

Nine animal rights activists who poured bleach onto meat in Sainsbury's in Fareham were arrested. The demonstrators claimed they were protesting against the importation of exotic meat, such as ostrich, crocodile and kangaroo. As well as contaminating the meat, activists pushed children's lollipops into packs of beef and lamb. A spokesperson for Fareham animal rights group said, Asda, the Co-Op and Sainsbury's agreed with us from the start and Tesco's are coming round to our way of thinking, but Sainsbury's said that so long as there was customer demand, they would carry on selling it. (The News 21.11.1997)

Slow worms, a protected species, have held up a housing development near Chichester. They will be moved to safety. (Observer 23.11.1997)

Compassion in World Farming is pioneering a change in the law which would ban the cruel mutilation of animals. CIWF is working closely with Labour MP Chris Mullin to introduce the Bill to ban the practice of cutting off pigs tails - often with pliers or hot irons. The new Bill would strengthen the regulations and allow proper enforcement. (The News 24.11.1997)

EU veterinary inspectors have raised obstacles to an early ending of the ban on British beef, including doubts about the safety of controls in Northern Ireland. (Independent 25.11.1997)

Hunts have been banned from 'digging out' foxes on Ministry of Defence land, the Government announced last night. The MoD owns 600,000 acres. (Times 25.11.1997)

More than two thirds of the public back the Bill to ban hunting with dogs, according to a MORI poll for the Times. (Times 27.11.1997)

In a historic decision that has cheered environmentalists across the nation, the US government has refused the licence of a 900ft long, 160 year old large river dam in Maine and ordered it to be destroyed to make way for spawning fish. It marks the first time in US history that federal authorities have opted to dismantle a functioning hydro-electric dam in favour of returning rivers to species of fish. (Independent 27.11.1997)

Radical proposals for deep cutbacks in beef production, including a voluntary decommissioning scheme to take farmers off the land is in the pipeline. Retirement packages for beef farmers will be part-funded by the EU. The beef industry will cost £1.5 billion this year alone. (Guardian 28.11.1997)

The Campaign for the Protection of Hunted Animals trumpeted the results of a new MORI poll showing 54% of adults in Henley-on-Thames wanted their local MP, Michael Heseltine to support Michael Foster's Bill. 64% of the 500 adults surveyed said they did not believe that fox hunting was an important part of the British way of life, and 76% thought hunters should take part in drag hunting. (Independent 28.11.1997)

Anti-vivisection group, the BUAV, won a test case to prevent an animal laboratory firm, Huntingdon Life Sciences, using anti-stalking legislation to curb its protests. The BUAV has asked the High Court in London to remove its name from a restraining injunction served on it by HLS. (Independent 29.11.1997)

Britain's flax processing industry is taking action to prevent farmers ploughing up areas of scientific interest. The action will help close the so-called 'flax loophole', under which the EC has been paying farmers tens of thousands of pounds to plough up ancient grasslands and wildflower meadows in order to plant flax. (Independent 29.11.1997)

Prince Charles was last night said to be giving up riding to hounds in the wake of Friday's enormous anti-hunting vote in the House of Commons. MPs voted by 411 to 151 in support of the second reading of Mike Foster's Bill. (The Express 30.11.1997)

Suffolk factory, Barber Richmore, closed today with the loss of 100 jobs. The owners of the Lowestoft-based meat processing factory, Chivers Hartley, blamed the BSE scare for the fall off in business. (Evening Star 4.12.1997)

The traditional roast rib of beef, T-bone steak and even Oxo gravy are set to disappear from British dining tables after the Government's surprise decision yesterday to ban the sale of beef on the bone because of a 'very small' risk that it could cause CJD. (Times 4.12.1997)

Britain keeps introducing new measures against BSE - but the focus should really be on the continent, where a growing number of countries are reporting cases of the disease. Scientists fear that worse is to come. (Independent 5.12.1997)

Will gelatine be the next beef-derived ingredient we worry about, as it comes from bones? Europe produces about 97,000 tonnes annually from boiled animal bones including cattle bones. (Independent 5.12.1997)

Animal welfare campaigners in India want to banish performing animals in the streets, but they say it will be a long time before the country accepts western standards of animal rights. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is campaigning to outlaw the barbaric treatment of animals. (Independent 6.12.1997)

Public confidence in lamb as well as beef took a hammering yesterday after EU scientists recommended a Europe-wide ban on some lamb on the bone. (Independent 9.12.1997)

M. Moullec, 35, a meteorologist living in Aurillac, south of Clermont-Ferrand, took his passion for conservation one step further with an experiment that cast man in the role of mother goose. For 400 miles from the southern edge of the Massif Central to their winter sanctuary in the Grande-Brière area of Brittany, the 12 barnacle geese accompanied Christian Moullec at an average speed of 35 mph on his delta-wing ultra light aircraft. The principal purpose of the journey across France was to steer the geese away from flightpaths where they were likely to encounter hunters. M. Moullec also fed the geese, swam with them, slept with them and even helped teach them to fly. "Abuses by French hunters are a scandal," he said. (Daily Telegraph 8.12.1997)

America has banned the import of all European cattle, sheep and related products amid fears of mad cow disease. (Times 15.12.1997)

The Government is soon to ban feeding pigs and chickens with waste from their own species, turning them into cannibals, because of the threat of BSE. The fact that this happens at all may shock anyone unused to modern factory farming. (Independent 18.12.1997)

An unemployed man was yesterday fined £600 after being convicted of damaging the habitat of a rare newt when he used a digger to scrape out a pond. The case before magistrates in Lowestoft is thought to be the first under European law protecting the newts. (Independent 18.12.1997)

Hunting of great white sharks has been banned in Australia. (Times 19.12.1997)

Huntsmen and their supporters are bracing themselves for clashes at 300 meetings across the country on their busiest day. Anti-bloodsport campaigners said up to 1,000 saboteurs will take to the field intent on disruption while another 5,000 demonstrators will hand out leaflets against fox hunting. (Daily Mail 26.12.1997)

A two-inch moth, the Sedina Buetineri, or Blair's Wainscot, thought to have been extinct for 50 years has reappeared, sighted in Dorset by Butterfly Conservation. (Independent 27.12.1997)

Wildlife experts have won a £10,000 grant to lure the otter back to the Yorkshire Dales. (Times 30.12.1997)

A haven for rare wild flowers and insects has been saved. The land, 46 acres of centuries old meadow land at Joan's Hill Farm in Chetley, near Hereford, has never been treated with pesticides or artificial fertilisers, allowing a huge variety of plants, endangered butterflies and moths to flourish. (Guardian 3.1.1998)

A pioneering wildlife park recreating arctic tundra, New Zealand waterfalls and jungle reedbeds is being landscaped out of 4 disused water-treatment plants bordering the River Thames. (Guardian 3.1.1998)

A previously unpublished has highlighted the use of BSE infected tissue in food. Millions may have eaten pure cattle brain, tongue and had food fertilised by beef blood. (Observer 4.1.1998)

After spending 10,000 hours trying to compile an inventory of living things in African forests, scientists admit that the task has overwhelmed them. Only 1.75m species have been described to date. In total there could be 10m or more, hidden undiscovered in tropical rainforests, coral reefs and mangrove swamps. (Independent 5.1.1998)

An anti-whaling group, Sea Shepherd, named the son of Norway's leading whaler 'crewman of the year' for accidentally sinking his family's boat. Sea Shepherd which has claimed responsibility for several attacks on whaling boats said that, by virtue of the accident the son of Steinar Bastesen had "made a strong contribution" to protecting whales. (Guardian 7.1.1998)

Circus trainer, Richard Chipperfield, 24, lost a part of his brain the size of a cricket ball when he was attacked by a tiger, and will probably be paralysed on his right side if he ever regains consciousness. (Mail on Sunday 11.1.1998)

The BMA has said that all raw meat should be assumed to be contaminated. (BBC Radio 2; 12.1.1998)

Kenny Cypress, an alligator wrestler in Florida has recently enhanced his act by inserting his head in the alligator's mouth at the end of the show. He told local television reporters from his hospital bed that he expects to be released soon when the bites have healed. (Independent 12.1.1998)

In the last 20 years, one food scare has followed another. Eggs infected with salmonella in December 1988, ready cooked poultry and soft cheeses with listeria in 1989, the same year as botulism in hazel nut yoghurt was found. (Independent 15.1.1998)

The Pytchley Hunt might be prosecuted by the RSPCA after some of its hounds killed a five-year-old cat, Missy, while the animal's owner watched, in a residential area at Old, Northamptonshire. (Independent 15.1.1998)

Two ginger Tamworth boars are still on the run six days after escaping in transit to the slaughterhouse. Animal sanctuaries across the country offered to put up the surviving five-month old boars. (Independent 15.1.1998)

Colin Blakemore, Waynflete Professor of Physiology at Oxford, was describing experiments on rat brains during a memorial lecture in London last night when a bottle was thrown and two women protesters jumped onto the stage. (Times 16.1.1998)

A New Zealand southern right whale thought to have been hunted to extinction has been seen off the Auckland Islands. Scientists said there were likely to be 100-150 living off a remote sub-Antarctic island. (Guardian 16.1.1998)

The Government announced changes to licences for tuna drift nets fishing. Elliot Morley, the Fisheries Minister, said it was to first step towards ending the unacceptable toll of dolphins in drift nets. (Independent 17.1.1998)

Detectives were yesterday examining incendiary devices thought to belong to animal rights activists. The devices and associated materials were seized from a car stopped by police in Northampton. Two men in their thirties are being questioned. (Independent 19.1.1998)

A campaign to improve information on food labels was launched yesterday by the food commission, to highlight the hidden ingredients and unwanted extras in food, and give details of genetically modified soya or other organisms. (Independent 19.1.1998)

The butcher's business John Barr & Son, implicated in the world's worst E.coli 0157 outbreak, in which 20 people died, was fined a total of £2,250 for food hygiene and safety breaches. (Independent 21.1.1998)

Police were today looking for animal rights protesters who destroyed meat worth £500 at a Farlington, Portsmouth supermarket. Five men and two women entered the store and began haranguing staff and customers about the sale of meats such as alligator and kangaroo. After the group were thrown out, meat was found around the store in trolleys and baskets with its wrapping torn and cat litter strewn over it. (The News 21.1.1998)

A penguin is on the run from a zoo in Northern Germany. Jorg Adler, the zoo director said that several sightings of the penguin had been reported. "Every time we get there all we find is a duck," he said. (Times 22.1.1998)

A wallaby thought to be extinct for nearly a century is alive and well on a New Zealand island. (Times 23.1.1998)

The bat population of Surrey has landed a lottery windfall. Today's handout of £42.5m by the Heritage Lottery Fund includes a record £6.2m to wildlife trusts. A second world war pillbox is to be extended for use as a bats breeding loft. Other projects include providing homes for birds such as nightjar and protecting coppiced trees, needed by dormice. (Independent 28.1.1998)

We are informed from Bristol that, on the 25th of last month, one Bodridge, a blacksmith of Bridgewater, in contempt of that day went out shooting. On Pallet Hill he espied a large flight of old ravens, fired and killed two, which so exasperated the rest, that they immediately descended upon him, and plied their bills and claws so dextrously upon his head and face that notwithstanding all possible care was taken of him, he died last Monday. This may appear strange, but our correspondent assures us it is absolute fact. (Adams Weekly Courant 20.1.1767)

The WSPA has called on hotels and airlines to help end the cruel spectacle of India's 'dancing' bears, which they say has led to the decline of the endangered Sloth bear, of which only 8,000 are left, 1,000 of which are in captivity to earn money for gypsies. (Observer 1.2.1998)

Customers in supermarkets could soon use hand-held scanners to check information on items as they shop, for allergies, such as peanuts, or foods high in fats. (Independent 2.2.1998)

ARK ANGEL

The Last Word

We would like to use this opportunity to once again thank all those who have stuck by us in times of need and also to welcome new subscribers to Arkangel Magazine.

Our regular contributors have helped the magazine to develop and to bring its readers up-to-date news from within the animal liberation movement and from the world outside. We shall continue to give free advertising space to vegans and to support local and national groups and organisations. Arkangel Magazine acts as an update on all animal issues whilst putting across readers' views, providing they fall within legal boundaries, do not incite racial or sexual prejudice, or condemn fellow animal rights campaigners without evidence. We welcome your thoughts, news or any other items of interest and appreciate any help you can offer. Press cuttings of actions are particularly useful and news from overseas is of particular interest.

Over the past nine years, Arkangel has witnessed a progression in the animal rights movement that can only keep growing as more people get involved. As relatively new organisations form, such as VIVA! who show people the way forward from the eating of animals to veganism and encourage more people to become involved in the movement, they join the already well-established local and national groups both up and down the country and abroad. The Animal Liberation Front and other direct action groups fight alongside those who prefer to follow a legal path, but they are all fighting a common enemy - animal abuse and those who perpetrate it in all its horrific forms.

As I write this, Barry Horne has resumed his hunger strike in retaliation of the Government's broken promises. Those who would like to be kept up-to-date with news regarding Barry should contact:

Animals Betrayed Coalition,
PO Box 21339,
London WC1X 0NJ
Tel: 0181 208 3289

Also, phase two of the Gandalf trial where ALF Press Officer, Robin Webb and Green Anarchist editor, Paul Rogers, are standing accused of conspiracy charges, should be proceeding at this time. For up-to-date information contact:

One Last Thing...

As Arkangel Magazine comes out infrequently, we would appreciate it, if you have a pressing need to reply to a featured article, that you send it to us and then we can pass it on to the person / group in question! In the case of letters sent to government departments, we would appreciate a copy too. Thanks!

Remember that you are part of an ever-growing movement and fighting for a cause that will sweep away the financially greedy and morally corrupt people who depend upon the torture and murder of innocent animals. The Animal Liberation movement shall triumph and animal abuse will be condemned to the dustbin of history! Fight on.

e-mail: animal@punk.org.uk
web: <http://www.punk.org.uk/ear>

Edinburgh Animal Rights was set up in March 1996 to campaign to end the abuse of animals in our society. They campaign on many areas of animal abuse which include vivisection, the fur trade, blood sports, factory farming and animal circuses. The group hopes to raise public awareness through its campaigns. They give financial support to local animal sanctuaries and rescue centres and provide an educational service to local schools, colleges and libraries. Fund-raising is an important part of the group's work as they rely on volunteers and donations. All money raised helps to fund campaigns and keeps the group running.

Please contact them for more information and details of meetings and current campaigns.

A Letter from Barry Horne

I think it is now necessary to update everybody on what has happened since the end of the second hunger strike (re: vivisection) and my thoughts on it all. That second hunger strike ended because the Labour Government agreed to meet with representatives of the Barry Horne Support Campaign (BHSC) as a means of resolving the differences between us, differences which had led to the escalation of the protest campaign and the second hunger strike. That the Labour Government negotiated with the BHSC, and agreed to a meeting, was very significant.

It could be viewed as the Government affording the Animal Liberation movement official recognition, and as a precedent that could not be undone. After that one meeting had taken place, the BHSC no longer felt able to hold further talks with the Labour Government and all contact between us was broken. At the same time, it is possible the wider movement didn't understand that decision by the BHSC, but in view of the lack of action by the Labour Government on vivisection since then, the reasons for it must now be clear. In the year since the end of the second hunger strike, no significant action has been taken by the Labour Government to limit or decrease the activities of the vivisection industry. Despite all the fine words at the time of the election, New Labour has displayed complete indifference to the plight of the animals suffering and dying in the labs. In the last year that indifference has been matched only by the increased scale of animal suffering. While the Animal Rights movement organises legally to overcome the horrors of vivisection it has to be said that the Labour Government has sought to block all progress towards a rightful and just solution to the problem. In all dealings between Animal Rights/ Liberation activists and the Government, we are treated with contempt and fobbed off with further lies, while behind the scenes the Government approves the further increased use of animals for vivisection. While we, the movement, have acted in good faith, the Government has responded with contempt and indifference. That situation cannot be allowed to continue.

Recently, communication from the Animal Liberation movement was delivered to the Labour Government detailing our feelings on the matter, and expressing our dismay at the bad faith displayed by them since the end of the second hunger strike. That communication calls on the Labour Government to make a significant and positive response on the issue of vivisection, to avert the possibility of a complete breakdown of trust between ourselves and the Government. At midnight on September 26th 1998, exactly one year since the end of the second hunger strike, the deadline for the Government to respond elapsed. Sadly, there was no response, so it will not be possible for any further negotiation, and further action in support of the ongoing campaign against vivisection has become inevitable.

The situation as outlined above has arisen solely because of the arrogant and indifferent attitude of the Labour Government, and at their door must be laid the blame for any situation that arises as a result. It is inevitable that we, the movement, shall drive back and defeat the vivisection industry. The actions of the Labour Government merely delay the inevitable and prolong the suffering of the animals. I would ask everyone to fully support the ongoing campaign to end vivisection in this country, and to fully support any and all actions taken as part of that campaign. At all times we should remember just what we have achieved so far, make no mistake that since the beginning of the present campaign we have driven the vivisection industry back and weakened their position. Now is the time to strike a major blow against them. With the second hunger strike the Animal Liberation movement showed it has the strength and commitment to fight and to resist, and to suffer in that resistance. At Consort, Hillgrove and HDS we have shown our determination to overcome, no matter what the odds, those who torture and murder animals. It is now necessary for us all to show this government (and all governments) that we, the movement, cannot be ignored or defeated, and that we will fight until we win.

The fight is not for us, not for our personal wants or needs. It is for every animal that has ever suffered and died in the vivisection labs, and for every animal that will suffer and die in those same labs unless we end this evil business now! The souls of the tortured dead cry out for justice, the cry of the living, is for freedom. We can create that justice and we can deliver that freedom. The animals have no-one but us, we will not fail them.

For the cause,

Barry

web: <http://www.animalaid.org.uk>

Animal Aid is at the centre of the growing public debate over the rights of animals. They investigate and expose animal cruelty, and undercover film and other evidence is often used by the media, thereby bringing these issues to public attention. Animal Aid has launched 'Animal Pride' which has taken two years to come to fruition. It arose out of feelings of bitter frustration many of us experience when, repeatedly, it is demanded that we defend our efforts on behalf of animals. A few of the aims of Animal Pride are to encourage a more positive view of animals - away from seeing them simply as victims, pests or predators, and towards an appreciation of their often extraordinary qualities and to encourage pride in our advocacy for animals. Animal rights has too often been seen as a fringe, even lunatic, preoccupation, whereas its central aims - to increase the circle of compassion and justice to embrace all living creatures - is a wholly positive ambition. Animal Aid is a group pushing for the vegan diet and for an end to all vivisection and related forms of exploitation and cruelty. Animal Aid is committed to non-violent campaigning and produce a very informative magazine 'Outrage' which is available on subscription. £12 waged / £8 unwaged (or aged 17) / £5 youth (16 or under). £15 for all supporters overseas. HUNTING

Fox hunt ban sought at Ashdown Forest

Local activists in East Sussex have been campaigning against the Board of Conservators of Ashdown Forest. This area is supposed to be a haven for wildlife yet the Southdown and Eridge and the Surrey and Burstow Hunts chase wildlife to their death across the forest several times a year. More info from Mid Downs Animal Action 01342 314728.

Biggest anti-hunt demo yet outside Parliament

On Wed 10 June 1998 there was the biggest demo this year against hunting held outside the Houses of Parliament. It was the latest protest in a series aimed at exposing the Labour Government as liars when they promised a ban on hunting before the last election. Over 500 protesters stood opposite Parliament with an extremely impressive display of anti-hunting banners. Some had come from as far away as Devon and Liverpool and braved the often torrential rain to make their feelings known. There have been several demonstrations outside the Houses of Parliament calling on the Labour government to honour its pledge to ban hunting. More are planned in the future. For details contact LAA on 0171 278 3068.

Green Party toff supports hunting

The Marchioness of Worcester, daughter-in-law to blood-junkie extraordinaire the Duke of Beaufort, is a vocal supporter of the Green Party. She is also a keen supporter of her local foxhunt, which conflicts somewhat with the official Green Party policy - strongly anti-hunt.

Hunt scum song flops

In August a group of bumpkins from rural Herefordshire released a pro-bloodsports song, called somewhat inappropriately "Guardians of the Land". The single was supposed to raise the spirits of hunt scum under the onslaught of bad publicity and anti-hunting bills. The idea behind it was to get hunters all over the country to buy the single and get it to number one in the charts, then use the resulting publicity to put forward the pro-bloodsports message. Unfortunately, this didn't quite go according to plan and the record briefly entered the lower regions of the charts before falling into obscurity.

National Trust upholds deer hunting ban

On Friday 2nd October 1998, the National Trust upheld its decision to ban deer hunting with hounds on its land saying that all scientists who have tested hunted deer agreed that they did suffer. A unanimous decision to keep the ban was taken by the Trust's 52-member ruling council after a three-hour meeting in which Trust leaders questioned Dr Roger Harris, of the Royal Veterinary College, who led the latest study into hunted deer. A Trust spokesman said: "After discussion with Dr Harris and Prof. Bateson, author of the earlier Trust-funded study, the council upheld its decision not to reissue licences to hunt deer on National Trust land. "The data from both studies suggested that deer experience suffering as a result of being hunted and that at least some experience a high level of suffering."

Hounds killed in Wales

Several hounds were killed in October by a train just outside Tenby in Pembrokeshire. The hunt involved was the South Pembrokeshire. A rail spokesman has said that ten dogs were killed as the train struck the hounds as they were being hunted across an active line. Eyewitnesses have been reported as saying that up to 15 hounds were dead or injured. This is no isolated incident. Hunt scum are often found trespassing on rail lines, which not only can delay trains, but frequently kills hounds. The hunts are almost never prosecuted.

Hunter fined for pollution

The joint master of the Prince of Wales's favourite hunt was fined £6,000 on 21 Oct 1998 after a chemical used to treat foxhounds drained into a river and wiped out a colony of 10,000 crayfish. Captain Ian Farquhar, Joint Master of the Beaufort Hounds, admitted responsibility for the pollution. Captain Farquhar allowed the insecticide to be washed down a drain after it had been used to treat his 160 hounds for mange. They are kenneled at the Duke of Beaufort's Badminton Estate in Gloucestershire. Captain Farquhar, 53, of Tetbury, admitted polluting, poisoning or using a noxious substance contrary to the Water Resources Act 1991. He was also ordered to pay £665 costs.

ALF activists damage hunt supporters vehicles

The Vine & Craven foxhunt held their annual hunt ball at Greenham, near Newbury, Berkshire in March 1998. Whilst the blood junkies were inside enjoying themselves, ALF activists did several thousand pounds worth of damage to their vehicles. Paintstripper was liberally applied to the bodywork and tyres were slashed, as well as windscreen wipers being snapped off.

Bloodsports spokesperson condemns hunt

The former public face of the pro-hunting campaign has taken legal action against her local hunt after it trespassed on her farm. Janet George, the former chief spokeswoman for the Countryside Alliance, threatened to "bite the balls off" the organiser of the Wheatlands Hunt in Shropshire after their unscheduled incursion forced her to put down two pedigree ewes. Janet agreed to accept £2,000 compensation from the hunt. "One out of every five hunts makes this sort of mistake," said Janet.

Hunt scum convicted of threatening protesters

Three men who threatened members of the South Dorset Anti-Blood Sports group at a hunt meeting in Somerset were sentenced by magistrates at Yeovil in March 1998. Bernard Martin, 59, of Haselbury Plucknett, his son Paul Martin, 33, of Dinington, and Gordon Martin, 51, of Haselbury Plucknett pleaded guilty to using threatening behaviour towards hunt protestors at a meet of the Cattistock Hunt near Haselbury Plucknett in October last year. The court ordered Paul Martin to serve 80 hours community service and pay compensation of £50. Bernard Martin was fined £70 and Gordon Martin was given a six-month conditional discharge.

Huntsman escapes drink-driving ban

The Crown Prosecution Service is appealing over the case of a hunt master who escaped a drink-drive ban. Rodney Ellis, 57, had almost twice the legal limit of alcohol in his blood when he was stopped by police. Mr Ellis, joint master of the Tedworth Hunt in Wiltshire, was given a £450 fine last week after he told magistrates he had been forced to drive his wife home from a hunt dinner because she was in pain from a riding fall earlier that day which bruised tendons in her leg.

Huntsman's leaving party disrupted

About fifty hunt sabs turned out to give Michael Farrin, huntsman with the world famous Quorn Foxhunt for the last 30 years, the farewell party he deserved. The bloodjunkie had hired Leicester City Football Club's banqueting suite to hold the bash for about 100 of his scummy mates on Friday 15th May. The demo had been advertised as "Tell Farrin to F Off!" and demonstrators made sure he got that message. All the scum parked in the club car park and then had to go through where the sabs were waiting to get to the club entrance.

Hunts exposed breeding foxes to hunt

Several foxhunts in the UK were exposed earlier this year for breeding foxes in artificial earths. Foxcubs in tiny cages were filmed on land belonging to the Sinnington Hunt in North Yorkshire. They were to be bred in appalling conditions before being released in front of a pack of hounds.

Other hunts using this practice include the Beaufort hunt, a favourite of Prince Charles, and the Thurlow hunt in East Anglia, headed by the food millionaire Edward Vestey.

Hunt organisation AGM picketed

The British Field Sports Society held its annual general meeting at London Scottish Regimental Trust, Horseferry Road, London on Wednesday, 13th May. Despite the location being moved at the last minute, activists managed to locate the scum and give them a rowdy reception. About 20 people were present to shout abuse at the 100 or so hunt scum going into the meeting. The bloodsports movement seems not to be getting much fresh blood involved as virtually all the scum present were "coffin dodgers in suits". Police were present but there were no arrests.

Staghunt kill within yards of League sanctuary

The Devon & Somerset staghunt shot dead an exhausted stag within yards of safety on an animal sanctuary owned by the League against Cruel Sports in March 1998. The hunt had trespassed on the land several times during a four-hour chase.

Beagle puppies liberated from hunt

On 18/6/98 four beagle puppies, all aged around five months, were removed from the kennels of the Trinity Foot Beagles, Barton, Cambridgeshire. The hunt is trying to play down this raid and is claiming it was the work of burglars.

Janet George libeled LACS spokesperson

A member of the League Against Cruel Sports won £1,500 libel damages in the High Court against a hunt supporter who subjected her to an personal attack during a radio phone-in debate. Janet George, press officer of the then British Field Sports Society, libeled her on Radio 5 Live last November. Janet George is now faced with a legal bill amounting to tens of "The most powerful action you can take to end animal suffering and protect the environment is to stop eating meat and fish. Help others do the same – add your voice to ours and join Viva!"

Juliet Gellatley, Founder and Director of Viva!

Why Vegetarian/ Vegan?

Every year in Britain, more than 700 million animals face the barbarity of slaughter – many fully conscious. Most spend their short, brutal lives in confinement, pain and misery.

Every year, the earth staggers closer to environmental disaster. Whether polluted water or torched rain forests; global warming or spreading deserts – livestock production is at the heart of the problem. Meanwhile, oceans are dying from the constant rape of fishing.

Viva! launches regular, hard-hitting campaigns and has forced the vegetarian and vegan debate back on to the agenda – on TV, radio and in the Press.

Viva! saves animals.

Viva! is investing in the future. With a huge commitment to youth education, Viva! is sowing the seeds of a more compassionate tomorrow.

Every year, millions of children in the developing world die from hunger – alongside fields of fodder destined for the West's livestock.

Every year, proof increases that vegetarians are healthier than meat eaters. But still our children's arteries continue to clog with animal fat.

Overnight, with the simple decision to stop eating meat and fish, you cease to play a part in this insanity.

Why Viva?

Viva! is helping people change to a vegetarian or vegan diet.

Viva! needs your help and support to end the shame of animal suffering, to protect the planet and to stop the killing. There has never been a better time, nor a greater need to fight for a world free from cruelty, pain and greed.

Together we can make a difference.

The Campaign Trail...

Viva! has launched many successful campaigns since its birth in October 1994...

Babe

Campaign against pig farming coincided with the film Babe and produced more than 150 news stories. Our local groups distributed 150,000 leaflets in just one week and caused pork consumption to drop by 10% nationwide.

Convert-a-Parent

Helped young people persuade parents that being veggie/vegan is a positive step. Over one-third of teenagers involved throughout the UK persuaded one of their parents to become vegetarian. More than 200 news stories.

The Crate

The Campaign to Resist Animal Transport to Europe included marches and rallies for children against live exports in towns all over Britain. Held a national exhibition of children's posters supported by national teen magazine, Just 17. Viva! local groups helped to stop live exports from several ports and an airport.

You'd be Mad to Eat Beef

Included the BSE Helpline, which took calls from thousands of meat eaters and helped them become vegetarian.

Also distributed thousands of thousands of BSE leaflets all over Britain. It was Viva! who first raised the gelatine and beef derivatives concerns and alerted the public to the bonereal fertiliser danger.

National School Talks Programme

Viva! has the largest school speakers network in the UK, explaining the vegetarian issues to young people. All speakers are trained by teachers at Viva! Training Days.

The Silent Ark

Launch of the first book to bring together all the vegetarian/vegan issues, written by Viva!'s founder. Serialised in The Times and promoted in national media (Radio 1's Nicky Campbell Show, Radio 4's Woman's Hour, The Sunday Mail and The Daily Telegraph).

Ostrich campaign

Viva! is campaigning to stop supermarkets and restaurants from selling this awesome, wild bird's meat with many successes.

Broiler Chicken campaign

A new campaign to persuade people that chicken is not a healthy option – for humans and certainly not the birds.

Join Us...

"I am delighted to support Viva! As a committed vegetarian, I hope to see more and more people living like this so that less animals suffer. Me and my dog are behind you all the way!"

Sean Hughes, comedian

"I wouldn't want to kill animals and I don't want them killed on my behalf. By not being involved with their death I feel I have a happy secret alliance with the world and I sleep much more peacefully because of it."

I wish Viva!

every success with its important campaigns."

Joanna Lumley, actress

The Livewire Guide to Going, Being and Staying Veggie

Launch of the first book for teenagers on all the veggie issues, with national coverage in the main teen mags and TV.

Going for the Kill

Major new and ongoing campaign to expose the myth behind 'humane' slaughter and to ban ritual slaughter and home killing.

These successes have helped spur the huge growth in vegetarianism and veganism and have focused a spotlight on the brutal way in which animals are reared and killed.

"Viva! is an invaluable voice for the animals. As a vegan, I am honoured to be a

LEATHER

The widespread use of leather by those who consider themselves compassionate towards animals is due mainly to ignorance about its production and the perpetuation of various myths

half

Leather is a by-product of the meat industry

Leather is not an 'incidental' product of the rearing of animals for meat; every last part of the animal is sold in order to make the whole bloody business profitable. The animal's blood is used for fertilizer and in pet foods; its hair is used for brushes and to stuff furniture; and its horns, hooves and bones are turned into gelatin(e) and put into confectionery, biscuits, jellies, vitamin capsules, photographic film and even match heads! The skin/hide, which is tanned to make leather, represents around 10% of the animal's total value — which makes it pound for pound the most valuable part of the unfortunate creature. UK leather sales total £435 million a year.

Although the skins and hides of sheep, pigs and goats are a significant source of 'raw material' for tanners, cattle hides and calf skins account for most footwear and leather goods produced in the UK. These are derived from the 3.5 million cattle slaughtered annually in the UK — including dairy cattle.

Speciality leathers are made from deer, alligators, lizards, sharks, snakes, crocodiles, kangaroos, ostriches, and other 'exotic' species.

myth 2

The animals spend contented lives grazing in fields and go to slaughter because they are old

Cattle are selectively bred and are subjected to a range of stock operations and procedures — including artificial insemination (AI), artificial weaning and feeding, embryo transfer, overwintering, mechanized milking, dosing with antibiotics, disbudding, castration, marking, and the separation of cow and calf within a few days of birth. As a consequence of undergoing a vicious cycle of pregnancy and lactation, dairy cows are especially susceptible to mastitis and lameness. Their calves — 300,000 of which are exported to Continental veal crates a year — provide tanneries with highly valued fine-grained skin, used for shoe uppers, jackets, gloves and wallets. However, the most prized skin is obtained from unborn calves, used to make soft suede.

The natural life expectancy of cattle is 20 years, yet beef cattle are killed at 1–3 years and dairy cows at 3–7 years — due to disease (36%), poor yield (28%) and inability to calve (36%).

myth 3

Unlike a wild fur-bearing animal, the meat (leather)-producing animal is killed humanely

At the very least, transportation to slaughterhouses causes animals discomfort and stress. Packed in cramped conditions, they may suffer heat exhaustion, heart attacks, bruising, hunger, dehydration and broken bones before reaching the slaughterhouse. Once in the slaughterhouse, they are stunned prior to having their throats cut. However, inaccurate or ineffective stunning may result in the animal remaining conscious or regaining consciousness. Slaughterers need possess no formal qualifications or training.

myth 4

Unlike the plastic alternatives, leather products are environmentally-friendly

Although the quality and availability of footwear and clothing products derived from petroleum-based materials have improved considerably in recent years, they are, unarguably, environmentally-damaging. Even the production of seemingly innocuous 'natural' materials such as cotton normally involves massive pesticide and insecticide use, and the application of bleaches, dyes and formaldehyde finishes.

Tanneries, however, not only emit unpleasant odours, they produce a host of pollutants — including lead, zinc, formaldehyde, dyes and cyanide-based chemicals. And added to the equation is the devastating environmental impact of raising livestock. Animal slurry is probably the major cause of water pollution; cattle, sheep and other ruminants are one of the main sources of the global warming gas methane; nitrogen in animal waste volatilizes to form ammonia — the greatest single cause of acid rain; the felling of trees for livestock results in soil erosion; and farm animals compete with us for land, water, fuel and consume 5–10 times as much primary plant food as people.

Purchasing leather goods helps to make the rearing and killing of over 39 million cattle, sheep and pigs a year in the UK a profitable concern, and maintains a demand that can be satisfied only by the taking of life.

HELP ARKANGEL HELP THE MOVEMENT HELP THE ANIMALS.

How Arkangel Helps

The aim of Arkangel is to help the animal liberation movement. In furtherance of this aim Arkangel produces an informative magazine and has set up various projects to help local groups and animal rights campaigners both in this country and abroad. These projects include the supplying of information about animal abuse and animal abusers, publishing material useful to animal rights campaigners and helping to set up networks of groups in foreign countries.

How You Can Help Arkangel

All Arkangel workers are unpaid, but all these projects need money in order to function effectively. Therefore, one way in which you can help is to donate money or, better still, by doing regular fundraising for Arkangel. You can also become a local Arkangel contact, so that as well as organizing fundraising, you could help distribute the magazine, report on local group activities, or assist the Arkangel Information Project.

If you are able to help in any way, please complete the relevant part(s) of this form and return it to Arkangel, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. Thanks.

ANGLING

Angler killed by fish in Australia

In May 98 a young British fisherman was drowned on holiday in Western Australia after being dragged out to sea by the giant catch he had hooked. The man, in his 20s, dived into the water in pursuit of the huge fish after it pulled the rod out of his hands. Witnesses believe he then became entangled in the line and was dragged through the waves to his death.

Anti-angling demo at tackle shop

As part of Anti-Angling Week there was a demo on Wed 17 June outside Farlowe's of Pall Mall, which sells fishing equipment to anglers. Channel 5 national TV news was there to film the protest and interviewed a representative of CAA and also a pro-sloshed canes in the water to scare away the fish. The anglers were fairly laid-back - in fact they seemed glad at a bit of excitement to enliven an otherwise boring Sunday afternoon. One couldn't believe his luck that he'd at last met a real-life angling saboteur!

ALF smash angling shop window

On Tue 2 Sept an angling shop on Tollington Park Rd, Finsbury Park, London was attacked by ALF activists. A steel shutter protected the shopfront but this was kicked in with such force that the window underneath was shattered. The premises have been attacked several times before since they opened earlier this year.

Angling shop forced to close

An angling shop in Leytonstone, East London, has closed down after repeated ALF attacks.

angling person. A banner was displayed outside the prestigious shop in the centre of London and leaflets were distributed to passers-by. This year's National Anti-Angling Week seems to have captured the imagination of the press - they can't get enough of it. There has been coverage on numerous local radio stations, on the national Today programme on Radio 4, and articles in the Independent on Sunday and the Express newspapers. Coverage has generally been quite positive, with anglers looking a bit worried at the prospect that a ban on foxhunting may turn more attention on them. Angling sabs will be taking place around the country. There was one in London on Sun 14 Jun at Walthamstow reservoirs where activists scaled the fence with two canoes and paddled around the anglers' lines. Others on the riverbank

Mink catch an angler

An angler had to beat off several starving mink with his landing net after they swarmed over him as he fished beside a river. John Stone, 37, of New Milton, Hampshire was attacked by the creatures near Ringwood in Hampshire not far from the fur farm where 7,000 mink were released by animal rights activists. Mr Stone said he thought the mink were driven wild by the scent of his bait - tinned dog food. He said, "It was horrible. Suddenly these dark shapes sprang out of the bushes nearby and jumped on me. They were all over me. There were at least four of them, if not more. They were running over my legs, my feet and trying to climb on my seat. It was terrifying, I was screaming, I picked up my landing net and tried to beat them off with it. I hit a couple of them but it didn't seem to affect them. They were fearless. I battled with them for about a minute and then they backed off. I immediately packed up most of my stuff and ran."

Fisherman accidentally kills himself

Fox Lake, Ill. — A man drowned after he and a friend inadvertently blew a hole in the bottom of their rowboat with a large firecracker. Daniel Wyman, 29, and his friend had tossed an M-250 firecracker into a lake to kill fish, said Jim Whipper, chief deputy coroner. A gust of wind pushed their 14-foot aluminium boat over the firecracker, and the boat sank about 100 yards from shore. The friend swam to safety. An M-250 is equivalent to a quarter stick of dynamite.

SHOOTING

Glorious Twelfth

The twelfth of August is the official start of the Grouse Shooting season, called the "Glorious Twelfth" by bloodsports enthusiasts. Sabs were out on the shooting moors in Yorkshire and Cumbria to disrupt the first days shooting. In London, there was a demo at the Savoy Hotel. This is because traditionally the first grouse to be killed is rushed down to London in a competition where all the top restaurants and hotels see who can cook and serve up the first grouse. The Savoy is always a participant in this.

ALF liberate pheasants

On 18th April 1998 the Animal Liberation Front attacked an estate belonging to the John Lewis Partnership. Thousands of birds were released and £1,500 worth of damage was caused to breeding pens at Leckford Abbas, near Stockbridge, Hants., where the department store chain has pheasant and duck shoots. For more info on the campaign against John Lewis contact the National Anti-Hunt Campaign on 01442 240246.

ALF attack pro-shooting Waitrose store

One night during the week beginning 16th March, ALF activists smashed several windows of the Waitrose supermarket on Holloway Rd, north London. Waitrose is owned by the department store chain John Lewis plc, currently the target of a campaign by the National Anti-Hunt Campaign. John Lewis own a pheasant shooting estate in Hampshire where their staff go on weekend killing sprees. For more information on the campaign against John Lewis: NAHC, PO Box 66, Stevenage, Hertfordshire, SG1 2TR. Tel: 01442 240246.

John Lewis Wildlife Killers - Blockade

Protesters blockaded the entrance to John Lewis' Watford warehouse. Gates were shut, a minibus was driven in front of them, and a protester was locked to the steering wheel by neck and to the seat by foot. The road filled up with lorries and vans for a while until all John Lewis deliveries were redirected. Several people began carrying carpets to and fro, and a desk was brought to the scene by John Lewis staff. A lone cop rolled up half an hour later, followed by another after an hour. Eventually 7 or 8 were present who stood around discussing what to do for another hour. Finally, after 4 hours, the fire brigade turned up and cut the protester loose. There were no arrests. John Lewis are targeted because tens of thousands of pheasants and other birds are massacred every year in shoots to entertain John Lewis partners.

Hunter killed by hunter

A 15-year-old boy was shot dead while out hunting birds with his father in Sweden. The father had just killed a bird when by mistake he fired another shot into the head of his son who died at once.

Hunter killed by stag

Poacher Marino Malerba shot a stag dead as it stood on an overhanging rock in Trento, Italy. The stag fell on top of him and broke his neck.

Gamekeeper gets off lightly

On Monday 13 July, gamekeeper Leslie Morris of 3 Golf Link Cottages, Downley Common, High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire was in court charged with killing badgers and countless other wildlife. He was fined £150 for firearm offences. He had written down everything he killed eg. 154 badgers, 50 cats, 156 crows, 8 deer, 2 dogs, 1,838 ducks, 13 fox cubs, 550 foxes, ... but got off due to police and witness incompetence.

Swan killer hounded out of town

The man convicted of repeatedly shooting a swan on an Edenbridge pond became the target of hate mail, was assaulted in the street and will leave the town to seek a new life in Devon. Roy Allen, 19, of Stoneyfield, Spitals Cross, was charged with criminal damage, killing a wild bird and possessing a firearm and ammunition in public. He repeatedly denied the offences. A 10-year-old boy saw Allen shoot the swan in the beak, neck and wing because he said it had attacked him. Allen was fined £300, including £165 in compensation, given 100 hours community service for criminal damage and 100 hours for the firearms offence. Magistrates also ordered the destruction of Allen's rifle and ammunition.

'Human shields' against deer killing

Villagers opposed to a cull of roe deer in woodland near Horsley in Gloucestershire have offered themselves as 'human shields' to prevent the killing. Every evening the wood echoes to the sound of dogs and local residents making it impossible for a marksman employed by the wood's owner to begin his work. A similar protest was threatened at Shadwell Wood near Saffron Walden earlier this year, where the Essex Wildlife Trust was planning to slaughter muntjac deer.

Wild boar hunts planned

Two hunt scum plan to let blood junkies on to their land near Tiverton in Devon to shoot their wild boar. Richard Jeffries and Alan Dedames already raise the animals to sell to their local butcher, but thought they could make some cash by turning their actual deaths into a sick 'game' for local perverts.

Wolf hunting banned in Poland

Wolf hunting in Poland has been banned for 3 years amid fears about the declining wolf population.

Hunter shoots himself dead

In August 1998, an unnamed blood junkie from Gillingham, Dorset, UK, accidentally shot himself dead whilst hunting foxes!

Shooting party attacked by saboteurs

From 'The Countryman's Weekly' Oct 9th 1998 (scum magazine) - Sent by the Portsmouth 3 Defence Campaign.

Nine saboteurs were charged with affray following an incident in West Sussex on Saturday week. They have been released on conditional bail. A small shooting party had returned to the landowner's home for a late lunch when a black van arrived outside. A group of balacava'd saboteurs emerged from the vehicle and walked into the yard. The landowner, with two others from the party, came out of the house while another telephoned for the police. The three men were attacked, with two of them being knocked to the ground by the saboteurs who were wielding staves. The saboteurs then drove off and their vehicle was later apprehended in Surrey. The victims suffered severe bruising and cuts during the incident described by one as "very frightening." Wendy Peckham, South East area spokesperson for the Countryside Alliance said: "Assaults like this are totally unacceptable. Those who take part in country-sports be it hunting, shooting or fishing, should be able to do so without fear of being attacked." The police responded very quickly, resulting in the charges of affray.

Support the Portsmouth Three

The Portsmouth Three Defence Campaign encourages everyone to carry out hunt sabotage in support of the Portsmouth Three. Sabbing the hunts, coursing competitions, shoots, animal races and angling events both directly helps to save lives and to show the police / hunts that we will not be intimidated by them or their tactics.

On 13th December 1997, during a mass hunt sab, the Hunt Retribution Squad targeted the notorious Hursley Hambledon Fox Hunt which has a reputation for extreme violence against hunt sabs. As a result of the HRS action, 16 hunt supporter's vehicles were damaged, three blood-junkies were injured and the hunt was directly prevented from terrorising and murdering wildlife that day. Sadly, as a result of this HRS action, 42 hunt sabs were arrested, 3 of whom were later charged with Conspiracy to Commit Violent Disorder. The 3 are all from Portsmouth and were singled out because the police and hunt believe that they organised the mass hunt sab.

Please write letters of support to the Portsmouth Three who are currently awaiting trial. It is a very uncertain and stressful time for them. Send your letters to:

Donations should be made to the Portsmouth Three Defence Campaign.

Finally, The Portsmouth Three Defence Campaign produce a very informative newsletter 'The Tally Ho'. Please write for details.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

ARGENTINA

* The local council in Rosario has decided to convert the city's zoo into a public park and to either rehouse all the animals in spacious facilities or reintroduce them into the wild.

(Animal Liberation Vic News, June '98)

AUSTRALIA

* Measures are to be instituted to improve conditions for cattle and sheep during transport from Australia to the Middle East. These include reducing loading densities for cattle over 450 kg during the Northern Hemisphere summer (May to September), providing straw and/or sawdust bedding and chaff to supplement the processed fodder and preventing the export of 'fat' sheep (which die at twice the rate) during the Northern Hemisphere summer.

(Animals Today, May/June '98)

* Members of Animal Liberation Victoria (ALV) have persuaded Chasers, a popular Melbourne nightclub, to refuse entry to people wearing fur and the Coles supermarket chain to stop selling the Sporting Shooters magazine. Chasers was also persuaded to cancel the use of live animals in a "circus special" it was hosting.

* Following an approach from ALV, Le Pine Funeral Services has agreed to no longer allow animal slaughter on its premises after it hosted a funeral ceremony which involved the ritual slaughter of a piglet and several hens. The Westfield company removed pregnant deer from its shopping centres when it became aware of a planned protest by ALV. The deer had been trucked down from Queensland, heavily pregnant and expected to give birth under the gaze of shoppers for promotional purposes.

(Animal Liberation Vic News, June '98)

* The Australian Federal Environment Minister has declared a prohibition on the killing and taking of the great white shark and the grey nurse shark.

(TRAFFIC Bulletin, June '98)

* AR activists successfully pushed for the release of a large fish imprisoned in a tiny tank for 11 years in the visitor centre of Snobs Creek Hatchery. The Murray Cod, named Mulloka, barely had room to turn around. Eventually government officials were persuaded to release the fish "into a large waterbody".

* In a precedent-setting win for animals in Australia, a court dropped charges against Patty Mark of the Action Animal Rescue Team for entering Happy Hens Egg World to rescue caged battery hens. The court also ordered the police to pay Mark's legal bills. According to the Melbourne Age, 'in the first case to test new trespassing laws, a long-time campaigner against poultry farms that use battery hens ... has opened the way for animal activists to trespass if protecting sick or dying animals.'

(Animals' Agenda, July/Aug '98)

AUSTRIA

* In the Austrian media it has been reported that the last Austrian fur farm has agreed with the government to close down on 30th November and not to appeal the new law banning fur farming or take it to EU courts. The fur farmer will receive compensation in return.

(Axel Balluch, 21/9/98)

BRAZIL

* Brazil marked the start of its sub-equatorial spring Monday by creating nine conservation nature reserves, from the Amazon to the Atlantic forest. President Fernando Henrique Cardoso signed decrees establishing five national parks, three reserves and an environmental protection area, covering a total of 4.62 million acres.

(InfoBeat, 9/9/98)

CANADA

* An Ontario court has ruled that the consumer boycott of forestry multinational Daishowa, launched by Toronto-based Friends of the Lubicon, is not merely legal, but a model of how such activities should be conducted in a democratic society. The court dismissed Daishowa's request for a permanent injunction on the boycott, which was initiated in response to plans by Daishowa to cut down 11,000 trees per day in the Lubicon. 47 companies representing 4,300 retail outlets across Canada have joined the boycott of Daishowa products.

(Earth First!, May/June '98)

CHINA

* Following an exposé by several animal protection groups, animal fights at a theme park in Chengdu have been stopped.

(Animals' Agenda, March/April '98)

DENMARK

* Copenhagen Fur Center (CFC) has announced that it will not renew an agreement with the International Fur Trade Federation (ITTF) to continue to help fund international pro-fur work. Without the CFC's participation, the ITTF would most certainly collapse as one of the world fur industry's most efficient tools to fund the fight against animal rights.

(Fur Age web site, July '98)

EUROPE

* Drift nets which every year trap and kill hundreds of dolphins and porpoises are to be banned in most European Union waters from 2002. Animal welfare, environmental and conservation organisations have been campaigning for more than 15 years for a ban on these walls of death, which are used to catch tuna and swordfish.

(Advocates for Animals Newsletter, Summer '98)

FINLAND

* The regional vet of Uusimaa, the area where the Kirkkonummi fur farm is located, has ordered the farmer Tom Hellstrom to close down his farm. It appears that the cages were too small and illegal, the wooden parts of the cages were rotten or bad, the farm waste was not taken care of etc. The animals have been moved to other farms and the vet will see the farm again in two months but doesn't think the farmer will be able to open the farm again. The vet got interested in the farm when Hellstrom wouldn't allow any journalists on his property after AR activists who carried out a raid there contacted the media about the bad conditions.

(Finnish ALF SG, 23/9/98)

* Orimattila court of justice has decided to charge fur farmer Markku Kuisma, who shot 3 AR activists during a raid on his farm last December, with three counts of attempted manslaughter and two counts of endangering life. The maximum sentence for an attempted manslaughter is 9 years. The activists have charged with "breach of domestic peace", which is not a very serious crime.

(Kristo, 23/9/98)

HOLLAND

* A proposal to ban chinchilla fur farming in Holland has been accepted in As with the Dutch fox farming ban, there is a phase out period of 10 years.

(Jekku Leiri, 29/7/98)

INDIA

* Following a campaign by animal protection groups, the village of Udbur in Mysore decided to no longer sacrifice animals in celebration of the Sankranti Festival. Flowers, sweet coconut water and bananas were placed in the local temple instead of the bodies of slaughtered creatures. A part of the celebrations where a fox was tied up, mutilated and mauled by dogs was also stopped.

(Compassionate Friend, Spring '98)

* Frogs in the Western Indian state of Rajasthan will no longer be dissected in school biology classes after the State Education minister ordered a ban following talks with the Mahajanam non-violence group. The ban has saved approximately 100 million frogs.

(Animals' Agenda, July/Aug '98)

ICELAND

* Orca whale Keiko, "star" of the film Free Willy, is rediscovering lost skills and honing his survival instincts now that he is back in his ancestral waters off the coast of Iceland. Things are going so well that Keiko, who has been in captivity most of his 22 years, could be released within two years from his protected home in a secluded harbour.

(InfoBeat, 25/9/98)

NEPAL

* Widespread protests and official intervention have compelled Mankha villagers to give up a plan to kill 500 monkeys who raided the villagers' crops.

(Earth First!, June/July '98)

NICARAGUA

* After a long battle by environmentalists and other groups, the Korean multinational SOCCARSA has withdrawn from Nicaragua and will not be doing any logging there. SOCCARSA's logging concession would have destroyed 150,000 acres of rainforest to make plywood.

(Earth First!, June/July '98)

PHILIPPINES

* The IFAW sponsored Animal Welfare Act for the Philippines has been signed into law. The Act covers all animals in the country including farm animals, wildlife and animals used in experiments and is the first law for animals that covers the entire country.

(Animals Today, May/June '98)

* The government of the Philippines has announced a prohibition on the killing and sale of whale sharks and manta rays.

(TRAFFIC Bulletin, June '98)

POLAND

* Wolf hunting in Poland has been banned for 3 years amid fears about the declining wolf population.

(NAHC Campaign Report, Summer '98)

* The Medical Academy of Warsaw and the University of Poznan have replaced live dog experiments with high-tech computer programmes.

* The Polish parliament has passed a law banning the breeding and fattening of geese for foie gras.

(Animal Times, Summer '98)

SWEDEN

* In October last year the leather shop Jacklagret in Alvsjo, south Stockholm, Sweden, had a car "repainted". On February 16, a bottle of red paint was thrown through the window at the same shop. On April 23, the same window was covered in red paint, a car belonging to the shop damaged and "Murderers" sprayed. On May 2nd the shop announced its closure.

(Eliminera Palsindustrin, 23/6/98)

* During an inspection on September 5th at a fur farm in Varobacka it was discovered the farm was closed down.

(The Wild Minks, 11/9/98)

* In early September, anonymous animal rights activists inspected a fox farm in Norberg, owned by Ulf Engbom. The result of the inspection was a 22 minute long video and over 100 photographs which were sent to the Swedish Society against Painful Experiments on Animals, Sweden's largest animal rights organisation. The society contacted the local animal welfare inspector and the town vet who made an uninvited visit to the farm. The farmer refused to let them in to inspect the farm so they had to call the police for assistance. Once inside, they found that the farmer was breaking a lot of regulations and decided that the farm must close before January 1999.

(Eliminera Palsindustrin, 24/9/98)

TAIWAN

* The World Society for the Protection of Animals (WSPA) has persuaded Taiwanese officials to improve animal control procedures after it was revealed that stray dogs were routinely kept in overcrowded cages with no food and water and often beaten. Although drowning and electrocution are still used to kill unwanted animals, Taiwan's Council of Agriculture reportedly will enact the first ever animal protection measure in the area later this year.

(Animals' Agenda, March/April '98)

* In Taipei a new law is to be instituted which requires dogs to be implanted with microchips, in order to tackle the growing number of people who abandon their animals. If a homeless animal is picked up, the 'owner' will be fined about £400. It is hoped that the use of microchips, in conjunction with public education, will end Taiwan's stray dog crisis within 5 years.

(Animals' Agenda, May/June '98)

* Taiwan has announced plans for dealing with its homeless dog problem in a more humane manner. The Council for Agriculture will create a taskforce to help local governments improve their treatment of stray dogs, and will also subsidise these efforts. The Council is also awaiting passage of a recently drafted animal protection bill and said it would begin implementing an effective sterilisation programme. The announcement came the day after animal protection groups orchestrated protests at Taipei economic and cultural centres world-wide to draw attention to the republic's barbaric treatment of strays.

(Animals' Agenda, July/Aug '98)

TANZANIA

* Anti-poaching activities in Tanzania have been stepped up by the government following evidence of a steep decline in animal populations in the country's protected areas.

(TRAFFIC Bulletin, June '98)

USA

- * The Dallas city council has allocated about £2 million for construction of a new, improved animal shelter to replace the city's existing one, which is run-down and severely overcrowded.
- * Following protests by United Poultry Concerns, Frying Pan Park in Chantilly, Virginia no longer de-beaks the chickens and turkeys kept there and has considerably improved their living conditions.
- * Following a campaign by wildlife protection organisations, the Clarkstown, New York, city council has voted to spare the lives of the areas Canada goose population. In past years, 200-300 geese at a time were rounded up and sent for slaughter, but this year non-lethal means will be used to reduce their numbers, such as allowing a dog to chase the geese away).
- * Huntingdon Life Sciences in the US agreed to pay $20,000 towards promoting and developing alternatives to animal research and $20,000 towards improving housing conditions for the lab's primates after being taken to court by the US Dept of Agriculture for failing to provide proper veterinary care, not anaesthetising animals properly and providing poor housing for primates.
- * Following the threat of legal action by animal protection campaigners, school officials in Michigan were persuaded to cancel an art exhibit consisting of 1,500 goldfish in plastic cups covered by plexiglass and to give the fish that had survived the ordeal to the Michigan Humane Society.
- * A group of 54 stump-tail macaques from the Henry Vilas Zoo in Madison, Wisconsin are to be transferred to a Texas animal sanctuary following a campaign by AR activists against the monkeys being used for research.
- * After a campaign by the Rocky Mountain Otter Protection Coalition, the Idaho Fish & Game Commission has rejected an attempt by trappers to get permission to sell the pelts of river otters.
(Animals' Agenda, May/June '98)
- * Yukon's Minister of Renewable Resources has announced an end to wolf control programmes during his government term (which will last 3 more years).
- * Following court cases brought by the Heartwood environmental group, five logging projects in Missouri have been halted.
(Earth First!, May/June '98)
- * The Fur Mart of Parsippany, NJ is now officially out of business adding yet another to the list of NJ furriers who have closed this year. The New Jersey Animal Rights Alliance had about half a dozen protests there over the winter.
(Animal Defense League - New Jersey, 1/6/98)
- * Six fur stores closed in New Jersey in the first 6 months of this year.
(Animal Defense League - New Jersey, 5/6/98)
- * Little Rock-based Dillard's Inc. (about 250 stores in 27 states) which is merging with Mercantile Stores (about 100 stores in 17 states) unofficially said it not only would continue to not carry fur in its stores, but would end the practice in Mercantile's stores when the merger was complete, gratifying anti-fur activists, who flooded Dillard's with letters, faxes, phone calls and e-mail when it was learned that Mercantile's stores sport full fur departments.
(Animal Rights News Wire, 3/6/98)
- * William Stevens, owner of the "Evolution" curio shop in New York city, has been sentenced to 16 months imprisonment for selling body parts and whole bodies of dead wild animals and Native Americans. The animals in question included bald eagles, gorillas, chimpanzees, gibbons, marmosets, elephants, lions, tigers, cats, walruses, pangolins, tortoises, turtles, bats, cobras, crocodiles, finches, buzzards, ducks, butterflies, tarantulas, scorpions, beetles and dragonflies. IPPL had sent a letter to the judge requesting a stiff sentence and members of IPPL's e-mail and snail mail Action Alert teams also sent letters.
(Int. Primate Protection League, 25/6/98)
- * After a 4 month campaign by rainforest protection groups, the city of Long Beach, California has agreed to only purchase wood from sustainable forests in the future.
- * A federal district court has ruled that the National Marine Fisheries Service is not doing enough to protect endangered fish and has ordered US government agencies to stop dozens of sales of woodland to logging companies until they have ensured salmon and trout won't go extinct. The ruling is expected to result in increased protection for salmon and trout on public lands throughout the American West.
(Earth First!, June/July '98)

* Anti-bloodsports campaigners have successfully managed to get the 'Predator Hunt Extreme 98' cancelled. The hunt is a 2 day killing frenzy, where hunters are awarded points for killing different animals.

(Underground, Summer '98)

* After 4 years of protests by PETA, Exxon has capped all its treater stacks, so stopping birds and bats from flying in and getting starved or burned to death. Mobil, Chevron, Texaco and Shell had already capped their stacks in response to the campaign.

(Animal Times, Summer '98)

* A Middlesex County (New Jersey) furrier, Marianne Furs, has signed a contract with the local Animal Defense League promising never to sell furs again. The decision came after the group started a weeklong protest in front of the store. Last December, Oscar Loewy Designer Furs in Metuchen liquidated its stock after the owners were besieged for weeks by the Animal Defense League. In addition to those protests, the Animal Liberation Front shattered the windows of the store.

(Home News Tribune, 3/7/98)

* Two Fur Vault stores have closed in New York.

(In Defense of Animals/NY, 9/7/98)

* Following 10 months of intensive research, Yoplait yogurt has developed a new package that will help prevent skunks from becoming trapped, and in some cases killed, in discarded yogurt containers. The new packaging is already on grocery store shelves in California and will soon make its way into stores across the country. Between two and 14 skunks last year were reported killed after their heads became stuck inside discarded Yoplait yogurt containers. Yoplait yogurt was informed of the problem 10 months ago by animal-rights activists and has incorporated their concerns into a new package design to help make the yogurt cups skunk-proof.

(Business Wire, Minneapolis, 21/7/98)

* In statistics released by the National Agricultural Statistics Service of the USDA, 415 mink farms were operating in the US in 1996 and 401 were in operation in 1997. A decline of 3%. For 1998 it is expected that mink production will drop slightly. Other sources claim that several big name mink farms have closed recently. Mink pelt prices were down 6% in 1997. In 1997 29 mink farms also raised fox. This is down from 40 in 1996.

(Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade, 23/7/98)

* The Starbucks restaurant chain has begun offering soya milk at several of its locations around the US.

* A California school district has voted to ban donkey basketball games. Sonoma People for Animal Rights led the campaign to stop the inhumane "game" at Analy High School, where it had been a 28-year tradition. Once the issue came before the school board in June, it agreed 4 - 1 that attempting to play basketball while riding a donkey was a "misuse of animals".

* The Animal Rights Foundation of Florida (ARFF) has convinced the Broward County Parks & Recreation Division to create a policy prohibiting live animals from given away at events held in the county's parks. Local officials were quick to agree with ARFF after the group expressed concern about a festival that had offered rabbits and fish as prizes.

* Colorado State University's (CSU) veterinary school has said it will stop using former racing greyhounds for surgical training (except for spay/neuter surgery), nor will any be put to sleep by the school. The announcement came shortly after it was publicly revealed that the dog racing industry had donated 2,652 greyhounds to the vet school in the past 3 years for teaching purposes. CSU will continue to take greyhounds only for spaying and neutering and then homes will be found for them.

* The number of Californians who hunt has dropped by almost 31% over the past decade, according to the state Dept of Fish & Game. In the USA nationally, hunting has declined 29% over the past 10 years.

* Animal rights activists have campaigned successfully against an attempt by carriage horse operators to get a ban on horse-drawn buggies overturned in Panama City, Florida.

* Kids wanting to be an Oscar Meyer wiener were out of luck in Detroit after a group of Michigan AR activists succeeded in getting several public appearances by the Wiener-mobile cancelled. The activists convinced various businesses and venues not to sponsor the hot dog-shaped promotional vehicle, which is used along with a children's singing contest to promote the company's meat products.

* This year's Spay Day USA, co-ordinated by the Doris Day Animal League (DDAL), resulted in a record-breaking number of animals neutered - a total of more than 108,000 cats and dogs, 40% more than last year. Since DDAL began sponsoring the spay-neuter-a-thon four years ago, more than 250,000 animals have been sterilized.

* A Southern California amusement park is closing its dolphin show following seven years of protests by Orange County People for Animals and others. Knott's Berry Farm, now under new management, will not renew its contract with the dolphin show once it expires in September. The park's general manager acknowledged that the protests affected his decision.

* The fur flew right out of Cracker Barrel Old Country Stores once animal advocates learned that the 354-restaurant/retail chain was selling Indian head-dresses fashioned with two racoon tails for children. A week after the Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade (CAFT) alerted activists to e-mail the company in protest, a Cracker Barrel spokesperson told CAFT that after "re-evaluating our product line, items made with real animal skins are no longer being purchased."

(Animals' Agenda, July/Aug '98)

* Four Seasons of New Vernon (Georgio Pappas Furrier), of Morristown NJ, has gone out of business. This is the 8th shop to go out of business in as many months in 1998 in NJ.

(Animal Defense League - New Jersey, 13/8/98)

* On the 22nd of Aug. the ALF paid a visit to Would Mink Farm in hopes of liberating more prisoners from their life of hell in small, filthy, dirt ridden concentration camps. They would have been returned to their natural habitat in the forests of Minnesota. Since mink are native to North America, they would be at home in rural, northern Minnesota. In approaching the sheds on the fur farm, the distinct smell of excrement and suffering was missing. When entering the sheds, it was noticed that they were empty of both animals and cages and the fur farm in now seemingly vacated.

(North American ALF Press Office, 5/9/98)

* A jury at Pottsville, Pennsylvania found all 7 defendants not guilty on charges of disorderly conduct and failure to disperse and rendered a guilty verdict on obstructing a highway. Sentencing has been set for November 9, 1998 and bail was reduced by the judge from $75,000 to $10,000. Motions for acquittal on charges of reckless endangerment and resisting arrest were granted on the grounds of insufficient evidence. The charges arose out of an attempt by AR activists to disrupt the annual Hegins pigeon shoot.

(New Jersey AR Alliance, 15/9/98)

* Activists who released about 800 Blue Iris breeding stock mink from the Smieja Fur Farm in Independence, Wisconsin caused a $200,000 loss and forced the farm to halt operations. Fur farmers in the area have had to respond to well-publicised mink releases by installing alarm systems and more fencing and using night security guards.

(Journal Sentinel, 23/9/98)

* The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has proposed to classify the koala as threatened under the terms of U.S. Endangered Species Act. The agency cited habitat destruction as the primary threat to the survival of koalas in the wild. The proposed listing would ban U.S. importation, exportation and interstate or foreign trade of koalas by anyone subject to U.S. law. Exceptions to the trade ban would be allowed for conservation efforts, the agency said. The purpose of listing a foreign animal or plant under the U.S. Endangered Species Act is to raise awareness of the species' plight and the need for conservation measures.

(InfoBeat, 24/9/98)

* President Clinton has put forward new rules to help protect the nation's threatened and dwindling wetlands. Clinton said the rules would strengthen environmental reviews and allow more public comment on proposed building projects in flood plains and sensitive water habitats.

(InfoBeat, 8/10/98)

* District Court Judge John Marshall has issued a permanent injunction against the Dallas Gun Club banning the killing - indefinitely - of thousands of pigeons at "canned" hunts, including one scheduled for October. A temporary restraining order halted the Carrollton club's August shoot, and a "practice" shoot that would have killed up to 4,000 pigeons last weekend. The permanent ban saves tens of thousands of pigeons. Judge Marshall said the Dallas Gun Club's hunt was in violation of Texas anti-cruelty laws, citing small cages, the lack of care for the birds and other "facility" failings as the reason for granting the permanent injunction.

SANCTUARIES

Allamdale Animal Sanctuary

Easter Baton Farm, West Benhar Road, Harthill, Lanarkshire ML7 5TG
Tel: 01501 823860

Founded in 1984 to help animals in distress. No thought is given to cost when life can be saved. All animals who can be neutered are. The sanctuary encourage and promote the neutering of cats and dogs to prevent unwanted litters. The animals that are already born must have a chance to live but at the moment Allamdale sanctuary are struggling and desperately need financial assistance, practical help and regular fundraising. Rehoming is also a priority. Any donations will be gratefully received.

Freshfields Animal Rescue Centre

East Lodge Farm, East Lane, Ince Blundell,
Liverpool L29 3EA
Tel: 0151 931 1604

The centre is currently running well and there is a good core of positive and capable staff who work very long hours. A vets' surgery is currently being built which will enable Freshfields to be one of the largest and most efficient humanitarian sanctuaries in the North West. In the long term, Freshfields has a very positive future but there are no illusions about the fact that the next 12 months are going to be very difficult financially. The centre is desperately fundraising for the vets' surgery as this is the only way forward if they are to reduce the presently crippling vets' bills. The greatest expenditure is the veterinary bills which are around £4,000 per month. By having their own surgery and part time vet, they will be able to make vast savings on drugs so although they will have a large initial outlay, in time, it will more than pay for itself. On a more positive note, fewer puppies have been brought into the sanctuary and the puppy kennels now house mainly small older dogs.

The wildlife unit has been taking in more and more exotic animals including a giant terrapin, a snake and an iguana. A kestrel, barn owl and a tawny owl have recently been rehabilitated. Freshfields still need any help that you can offer, be it in the form of donations, practical help or building and other materials.

Hillside Animal Sanctuary

Hall Lane, Frettenham, Norwich NR12 7LT and at Bridge Farm, Downham Market,
Norfolk PE38 0AU
Tel: 01603 891227 / Fax: 01603 891458
e-mail: hillside@mailgate.ftch.net web: www.hillside.org.uk

Hillside was founded to help all animals in need, particularly those who suffer in the intensive factory farming industry. If you would like to adopt one of the rescued animals (only £6 minimum a year) please write for details. Hillside also have an extensive range of merchandise available and the sanctuary produces a very informative magazine packed with information. During August Hillside intervened to rescue three cows from a Sunderland city farm which had been forced to close due to financial problems. The cows, called Olga, Jersey and Black Bess, would have been destroyed if Hillside had not acted to save them. Now, they have a safe, permanent home at the sanctuary in Frettenham. It is especially pleasing that the three cows will stay together.

Special Appeal

Celia Hammond Animal Trust

Celia Hammond's Animal Trust in Lewisham, South London, is in urgent need of volunteers - are you able to offer some help? They need help cleaning and feeding the animals and also with their rescue work. An ability to drive would be an advantage but is not essential. Accommodation can be provided. Live-in volunteers are also needed for the same sort of work at the sanctuary near Hastings. The work is hard but rewarding and the sanctuary is in beautiful surroundings.

Farm Animal Rescue Sanctuary

Farm Animal Rescue Sanctuary was established in 1988 by Carole Webb. The sanctuary, which is home to over 500 animals, has been hit recently by a number of tragedies. Carole's husband was killed by a drunken driver and her daughter recently died from a heart attack aged just 32. Carole's mother died just six weeks after that, and with the emotional stress of her loss added to the overwhelming stress of keeping the sanctuary going, she is in need of vital help. With these deaths came a huge loss of income which has left Carole very concerned for the future. Although the animals in her care are at present very well cared for, the future looks bleak.

How you can help...

■ The Sanctuary needs to be able to secure a monthly income. Without this the animals will always be in danger. So please become one of those vitally needed 1000 people who will adopt an animal for just £2 per month - or more if you can afford it. This can be done by banker's draft or direct donations.

■ You can also help by adopting an animal on an annual basis for £24 or more, if you can spare it. Donations of any size are always greatly appreciated. Also, please consider Life Membership for £150.

CAPTIVE ANIMALS PROTECTION SOCIETY

CAPS was founded in 1957, and for many years has worked behind the scenes persuading councils to ban circuses with performing animals on their land, as well as publicising the plight of performing animals. All this had to be carried out very low key, with CAPS not getting the recognition that it so deserved.

In 1997 radical changes were made to CAPS, and the Society was reorganised. Two leading anti-animal circus campaigners were brought in, Diane Westwood and Pat Simpson, and the profile of the group has been raised significantly. CAPS works on a local, national and Government level. Pat Simpson leads the campaign to persuade councils to ban circuses with performing animals on their land, and it has become extremely successful. Diane Westwood works on press and media to raise the group's profile, as well as organising specific campaigns.

In September, we featured in the Express newspaper and on GMTV to publicise the story of Fred the circus bear, and our campaign to persuade Circus King to release him to a sanctuary. In the last 6 months we have taken part in three TV programmes on circuses to be broadcast next year as well as numerous radio and TV interviews and debates. Our educational materials have been updated and we now produce leaflets and fact sheets on circuses and zoos. We are currently working on educational videos for young people on the subject of captive animals and, finance permitting, we intend to do an anti-zoo video for schools.

We try to help local groups as much as we can, and carry comprehensive files on many British circuses. We can advise groups on numbers and species of animals as well as any history of violence the circus may have. This year we were fortunate enough to have sponsorship specifically for national newspaper advertising. We also featured in 'Sugar' magazine, and were inundated with requests for information when our zoo article appeared.

CAPS' policy is to educate, lobby for legislation to ban ALL animal acts in circuses, and to expose suffering. CAPS photographs are used by PETA and many other groups and have been published in national newspapers. Councils, MPs, members of the public and animal rights groups request CAPS information both here and abroad. CAPS have many projects planned for the future.

A reputable farmer at Bowbrink in Norfolk, on his return from Norwich last week, was so bemused by the cold to be obliged to lie down and would have perished, but that his dog, as if sensible of his situation, got on his breast, and extending itself across him, preserved his lungs from the cold, which would otherwise have proved fatal. McLibel Update

McLibel 2 Sue Police

Dave Morris and Helen Steel who waged a record legal battle against McDonald's have filed a lawsuit accusing London police of colluding with the burger giant to invade their privacy.

They issued writs seeking damages of up to £100,000 from Metropolitan Police Commissioner Paul Condon and a detective whose identity was not made public. Helen and Dave claim that the police wrongfully turned over information about them when McDonald's were investigating British activists handing out leaflets accusing the company of being exploitative.

Helen and Dave say that the McDonald's Head of Security, Sid Nicholson, was a former police boss who testified that he would go to his contacts in the force if he wanted to get information about protesters.

"This collusion between the police and a multinational corporation against members of the public exposes the political role of the police in ensuring the wheels of big business keep turning", the McLibel 2 said in a statement. "It's clear that their claim to be impartial defenders of the public is a hollow one."

Their lawsuit, brought in the High Court, contends that police officers allegedly provided McDonald's and its private investigators with the home addresses of Helen and Dave, as well as other information about Dave that should have been confidential.

"We do not know the sum total of what they gave out," said Irene Nembhard, an attorney handling the lawsuit for the pair. Having a lawyer on the case will be a novel experience for Helen and Dave, who had defended themselves for years against McDonald's because Britain does not permit public assistance in libel suits. Helen said that McDonald's private investigators placed the McLibel 2's homes under surveillance after getting help from the police.

The McLibel 2 are also seeking from the police a public declaration that they only involve themselves in lawful conduct and are demanding an injunction to stop it happening again.

Video cameras compare faces to crime records

BY A CORRESPONDENT

PEOPLE passing the 144 security cameras in the East London borough of Newham will have their faces automatically checked by a computer against a video library of known criminals.

When the system recognises a face, a security officer in the council's camera control room in East Ham will contact Forest Gate police station. Police can watch the person on a screen in their own control room and decide whether to take action. Similar technology has been used in the United States but this is the first time it has been tried in Europe.

Newham council's environment director, Malcolm Smith, said: "We have pushed this technology further than anybody else. Once a face is recognised it is up to our operator to make a judgment whether to contact police."

"They can then decide whether the person presents a shoplifting threat, a burglary threat or whatever, and whether to take action. The system is all about crime prevention. If, for example, a known shoplifter is seen coming out of East Ham Tube station, security staff at local stores can be alerted."

The system has alarmed some civil liberties groups, but Mr Smith said: "We are interested in the civil liberties of those people who want to go about their business lawfully in Newham without being bothered by anybody."

The system is sophisticated enough to take into account the angle of the person's head, light conditions, whether the person is wearing spectacles, make-up or earrings, their facial expression, facial hair and even the ageing process. Only the police will know the identity of the people stored in the database.

The system is being operated for a six-month trial period, with the £60,000 cost of the pilot scheme being shared between the council and Software & Systems International, the Slough-based firm that installed the software.

Anti-hunting MPs say fight goes on

Michael White
Political Editor

ANTI-hunting MPs and their allies last night promised to continue bringing legislation to ban fox-hunting before Parliament until they overcome the Tory-led guerrilla forces which yesterday killed Mike Foster's bill.

After filibustering had blocked decisive progress for the second successive Friday, Mr Foster defiantly insisted that his bill was "alive and kicking" and would be back in the legislative queue next Friday, with its impassioned backbench supporters.

"We are coming back, we are not going to pack up on this bill. If my opponents think they can abuse the House and the electorate by engaging in delaying tactics, they are sadly mistaken because the British electorate want to see this bill passed," the Labour MP for Worcester told reporters.

But there are four other private member's bills in the queue ahead of Mr Foster's Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill to get their Commons third reading. And pro-hunting MPs promised to "talk it out" again, as they did yesterday. "This bill is still a mess. It's badly drafted and it's wrong in principle. It needs a few more days attention," said David Maclean, the former Tory Home Office minister, who is organising the hunters' rearguard action, described as "parliamentary vandalism."

Mr Foster insists that he and his allies will bring in new bills or seek to amend criminal justice bills to achieve the same effect.

They now hope that public opinion will force ministers to provide government time. Removal of the hereditary peers, pillars of the hunting classes, will also help them. Kate Parminter, spokeswoman for the Campaign For The Protection of Hunted Animals — an umbrella group of anti-hunting organisations, said: "We will be redoubling our efforts. We will continue to use every opportunity during the lifetime of this parliament to secure a ban."

Yesterday's five hours of debate were all but doomed when Speaker Betty Boothroyd ruled against a clause to outlaw fox hunting by amending the 1996 Wild Mammals (Protection) Act. Tony Blair was absent working at Chequers, despite his declared support for the bill.

Hirst's formaldehyde art fails to sell

BY JOHN SHAW

WORKS in formaldehyde by the artist Damien Hirst failed to sell at an auction of contemporary art held in London last night.

A cabinet of 100 fish suspended in a formaldehyde solution, called Alone Yet Together, failed to find a buyer at the sale at Christie's. It was the first of Hirst's formaldehyde works to go to auction, but bidding stopped at £85,000, under the reserve price and well short of the estimate of £100,000 to £150,000.

Another formaldehyde piece, entitled Loss of Memory is Worse Than Death, also failed to reach its reserve, despite being estimated at between £80,000 and £120,000.

Exclusion zone stops protest link to carnival

POLICE set up a five-mile exclusion zone around Witney today to keep animal rights protesters away from the town's annual carnival.

Demonstrators from the Save the Hillgrove Cats campaign planned a rally at the start of the carnival in Station Lane, Witney. But Thames Valley Police and West Oxfordshire District Council were given special powers by Home Secretary Jack Straw to stop them getting into the town.

The exclusion zone was put in place at 8pm last night and will last until 8am on Monday.

Assistant chief constable Robert Davies accused extreme protesters of being "nothing short of vicious thugs", adding: "The demonstrators have publicised their plans to gather at the same place and at the same time as local residents are holding their annual Witney carnival.

"This is a family event for joy and celebration and we cannot allow it to be threatened or infiltrated by a gathering which has the potential - based on past experience - for serious violence."

A number of checkpoints were set up to enforce the five-mile zone.

Mr Davies said police would be able to distinguish between protesters and those going to the carnival by the mode of transport in which they arrived, the equipment they carried with them and by questioning.

By SARAH BROWN

He added: "The aim is to prevent known activists from breaking the law and using violence and extreme intimidation to achieve their aims."

Geoff Bonner, chief executive of West Oxfordshire District Council, said: "Our real concern is the carnival. Families and children are coming for a good day out in the town.

"There is a lot of scope for friction."

Police will have the right to unmask hunt saboteurs

By NICHOLAS WATT, POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

THE POLICE are to be given new powers to remove balaclavas and face coverings from hunt saboteurs and rioters who deliberately conceal their identities.

Alun Michael, the Home Office Minister, will table an amendment to the Crime and Disorder Bill next week which would allow the unmasking after an arrest.

The Earl of Carnarvon, who drew up the amendment, told a meeting of the Standing Conference on Countryside Sports yesterday: "Violent thugs and hooligans are to be unmasked. This will help against those unpleasant attacks by hunt saboteurs. It is particularly galling when people hide behind scarves."

Mr Michael agreed to accept the Earl's amendment after National Front supporters covered their faces at a recent march in Dover. One Whitehall source said: "People have used masks in public places to terrorise people. They have run rampage on housing estates and disrupted football matches." A senior officer will have to be satisfied that a rioter is deliberately concealing his identity and the mask will be removed only after he is arrested. The source said: "Police will not be able to leap up in the street and grab a face covering."

Janet George, of the Countryside Alliance, described the amendment as a welcome move to ensure that people were not intimidated. "It's a sign the Home Office is listening to the problems that have arisen from violent hunt saboteurs."

Court blocks plan to kill stray dogs

By Rahul Bedi
in New Delhi

STRAY dogs in the western Indian city of Bombay have been granted a 15-day stay of execution as the local authority prepares to launch a campaign to eradicate rabies.

Yesterday, a court ordered the Bombay Municipal Corporation to explain how it would distinguish rabid dogs from healthy strays after a petition by animal rights activists.

The practice of destroying stray dogs en masse was halted in Bombay in 1994 after protests that the practice violated the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act.

Animal rights organisations were made responsible for sterilising strays. But municipal officials said plans to re-introduce extermination had been drawn up after complaints of dog bites in several localities.

They said Bombay's population of stray dogs had multiplied. More than six million of Bombay's population of around 12 million live in slums and shanty towns, together with thousands of diseased dogs.

About 20,000 Indians die from rabies every year, half of all those who die of the disease worldwide.

Federal health officials in New Delhi said that about 95 per cent of rabies victims contracted the disease after being bitten by their pets or coming into contact with infected saliva.

The moment Briton was gored by bull

A LONDON student was in intensive care last night after being gored during the annual bull run in Pamplona, northern Spain, writes Tim Brown in Madrid. Paul Hagger, 21, from Ruislip, west London, the son of a Scotland Yard detective and a Spanish mother, is in the Virgin de Camino hospital.

Millions watching Spanish national television saw Mr Hagger being gored on Sunday after the morning running of the bulls through the city, the daily highlight of the week-long fiesta made famous by Ernest Hemingway.

After the run, revellers jump into the ring with a young bull. Television showed Mr Hagger standing about 15ft from the animal when it suddenly charged.

He turned, but was caught on one of the bull's horns before falling on to the sand. He was dragged clear and rushed to the ringside infirmary where doctors carried out emergency surgery. The horn penetrated a foot into his back, entering his rib cage.

He will remain in intensive care for several more days.

"My mother telephoned me today and I was able to tell her that I will recover and hope to be allowed home soon," Mr Hagger said yesterday.

Animal rights protest at gallery

ANIMAL rights protestors are holding a demonstration outside an art gallery that is showing a film featuring the slaughter of animals.

The Animal Alliance is staging the protest outside the Underwood Street Gallery tomorrow at 1.30pm. The group's supporters describe the video show and photographic display in Hermann Nitsch's show Orgies Mystery Theatre as "a perverse orgy of violence".

They said that scenes include hanging animals upside down and cutting into their bodies, naked performers pictured with the skinned body of an animal, and others pouring blood over them.

In 1966 Hermann Nitsch's art was broken up by the police and a show in Edinburgh was stopped at the last minute in 1988.

The show has been running at the Underwood Street Gallery for three months.

The gallery is open from 1pm to 6pm from Fridays to Sundays. The exhibition ends next Friday.

Pickets cleared

Three animal rights campaigners who picketed a mink farm near Newcastle upon Tyne have been cleared of harassing the owner. A magistrate at Bedlington, Northumberland, told them: "The right to protest is one which is highly valued and protected."

Animal rights activists free 6,000 mink

UP TO 6,000 mink swarmed into the New Forest and neighbouring countryside yesterday after animal rights activists set them free from a fur farm, writes Keith Nuttall.

Members of the Animal Liberation Front (ALF) cut through wire fences at Crow Hill farm, near Ringwood, Hampshire, filling nearby gardens with the small black and white predators. Police have warned pet owners to protect their animals as mink are known to hunt poultry, rabbits, guinea pigs and hamsters.

The attack in the small hours of yesterday morning came hours after one of the farm's workers, Ian Stroud, pleaded guilty at a magistrates court to cruelty charges relating to mink at Crow Hill and another farm.

Responsibility has been accepted by the ALF, whose press officer Robin Webb told the Independent on Sunday that the activists want to "highlight the fact that the fur trade is still making its disgusting living."

But an RSPCA spokeswoman said: "We condemn this, not only for the sake of the mink, but for the local wildlife. It's utterly irresponsible."

Professor Stephen Harris, of the University of Bristol biology department, said that most of the mink would die from starvation. Those that could kill would take birds nesting on the ground, water voles and pets in insecure cages.

Letter bombs sent in animal welfare protest

BY HELEN JOHNSTONE

LETTER bombs have been sent by animal welfare extremists to an Oxford professor and the owner of a farm which breeds cats for experiments.

Colin Blakemore and Chris Brown escaped injury when the devices failed to go off and army bomb disposal experts were brought in to make them safe. They were sent only weeks after Mr Brown received a bomb threat from a group calling itself the Provisional Animal Liberation Front.

Two more devices were sent to two workers at Hillgrove Farm in Minster Lovell, Oxfordshire, which has been a target of animal welfare protests for several years. They also failed to go off.

A spokesman for Thames Valley Police, which has instituted a major investigation into the incidents on Tuesday, said that the intended targets had realised that the packages were suspicious and had called in the emergency services.

Robert Davies, the Assistant Chief Constable, yesterday told the public to be vigilant about suspicious packages. "These letters had the potential to cause serious injury. They are a cowardly attack and an unacceptable form of protest," he said.

Campaigners have staged regular demonstrations outside Hillgrove Farm, many ending in violence. Twelve days ago, 39 people were arrested for public order offences, including a ten-year-old boy who was later cautioned.

Thames Valley Police have spent an estimated £400,000 controlling the protests over the past six months, making it their largest public order task.

Professor Blakemore, who was in America and unavailable for comment yesterday, became one of the country's main targets for extremists after he publicly defended his work involving kittens. He is head of physiology at Oxford University and is one of only 17,000 licensees in the lowest category for animal experiments.

Over the years, his Oxfordshire home has been turned into a fortress after repeated attacks. One of the most vicious occurred in January when a group terrorised his wife, Andrea, and a visiting professor from Canada by hurling bricks and bottles through windows and trying to smash down his front door with a block of stone.

A week earlier he had been injured in London when activists rushed the stage where he was giving a lecture.

'Animal activists' in bomb raid on livestock lorries

By Susie Steiner

BOMB disposal experts and police searched the premises of a livestock haulage firm yesterday after 40 incendiary devices were found planted beneath vehicles.

Two lorries were set alight early yesterday and fire-bombs were found under 20 other vehicles in the company's yard in Bruton, Somerset.

The attack was thought to be the work of animal rights activists. Robin Webb, a spokesman for the Animal Liberation Front, said: "I am confident that this is the work of the A.L.F. It bears all the hallmarks of previous attacks against similar businesses."

The premises of A F George and Son, which used to transport livestock abroad, had been locked at 9pm on Sunday.

When a driver arrived for work at 3.30am yesterday he noticed a glow under one of the trucks which burst into flames.

He then noticed a number of devices under other vehicles and began pulling them off. Fire crews, bomb disposal experts and more than 50 police officers cordoned off the area and searched the premises and surrounding fields.

The second lorry caught alight as fire crews fought to contain flames destroying the first vehicle.

Mark George, the son of the company's owner, said the driver and another employee who helped to remove the devices could have been badly hurt.

"There were incendiary devices exploding and they went around removing others, not knowing if they were going to go off in their faces," he said.

"There were at least two devices on each vehicle. We used to export to Europe and most likely it was the work of animal activists."

"Fortunately, no one was hurt and it could have been a lot worse if our men had arrived half an hour later."

Mr Webb said: "The intention would have been to destroy the fleet and trucks so they could not transport animals and drive this firm out of business."

A Somerset fire brigade spokesman said: "Around 40 devices were found and they could have caused a lot of damage. It is only because some of the drivers arrive for work at that time that the fires were not much more serious."

"Whoever planted these devices had no regard for the people who work there or the firefighters who have to deal with the situation."

Det Chf Insp Tracy Hayler, of Avon and Somerset Police, praised the drivers who began removing the devices. "The actions of these men undoubtedly prevented a lot more damage," she said.

British designer joins fur protest

FROM TUNKU VARADARAJAN IN NEW YORK

ANIMAL rights activists have secured the support of Stella McCartney, the British designer, in their campaign against Fur Fashion Week, which started in Manhattan yesterday.

The annual event has acquired a celebratory air as sales of fur climb. The US market last year was worth £1.27 billion ($779 million).

Ms McCartney has offered her backing to People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (Peta), the largest US animal rights organisation. It is holding a raucous protest outside the Manhattan Centre Grand Ballroom, the fur fair venue, which includes a non-stop video depicting gory scenes from mink farms and fox culls, narrated by Ms McCartney.

"Fur may be fashionable for a few pretentious fashion editors, but for the general public it's as popular as a cold sore," said Dan Mathews, Peta's director of campaigns.

Reprieve for ancient redwood forest

FROM GILES WHITFIELD IN LOS ANGELES

THE world's largest unprotected forest of ancient redwoods has been spared the chainsaw in a $500 million (£310 million) deal signed two days after a protester was killed by a falling tree.

David Chain, 24, a member of the Earth First radical environmental group, became the first victim in a ten-year struggle to protect the trees when he was crushed. The Pacific Lumber Company described his death as a "tragic accident" on its land, 300 miles north of San Francisco.

Mr Chain had been taking part in a last-ditch effort to save trees the company was in the process of logging, deliberately standing where they were likely to fall. Two days later, in a long-planned ceremony, the surviving trees were bought by the Government.

The Headwaters Forest deal will protect 36,000 acres of unique woodland for 50 years and will conserve a fifth of that in perpetuity, including 11 "cathedral" groves, containing trees thought to be as old as Christianity.

Vice-President Al Gore welcomed the deal as a way "to preserve for future generations a vital, irreplaceable piece of America's natural legacy". But conservation groups have condemned it as too little too late, and an unwarranted cash windfall for a tycoon who has become a bogeyman of the environmental movement.

The $500 million, half from Washington and half from California, will go to Charles Hurwitz, head of the Houston-based Maxxam Corporation, who bought Pacific Lumber in a hostile takeover in 1985 and has since said he will log the company's redwoods whatever their ecological value.

Hunt master fined over pollution

Hirst to back kebab chain

BY DOMINIC WALSH

DAMIEN HIRST, the controversial sheep pickler-cum-restaurateur, is to turn his artistic talents to the humble kebab.

Hartford Group, the Aim-listed group into which Pharmacy, Mr Hirst's fashionable London restaurant, has been reversed, is to launch a chain of trendy kebab shops.

The group, which yesterday received shareholder approval for the £7.2 million acquisition of Pharmacy's parent company, Bluelodge, will open its first kebab shop in Islington next year. If the formula succeeds it will be developed into a chain.

Matthew Freud, the PR guru and chief executive of the re-shaped Hartford board, called kebabs "the last unbranded fast food concept in the country". He added: "People love kebabs but you have to have eight pints to eat them because you mistrust that dog-shaped thing in the window. It will be as different as Prêt à Manger is to an Italian sandwich shop."

The group, whose shares will return from suspension on Monday, is planning Pharmacy restaurants in Paris, Dublin and New York. It is also in talks to acquire Quo Vadis, the Soho restaurant which, like Pharmacy, is part-owned by Messrs Hirst and Freud. Hartford's non-executive directors are Nigel Wray and Nick Leslau, the property entrepreneurs, and Michael Edelson, founder of Prestbury Group.

THE joint master of the Prince of Wales's favourite hunt was fined £6,000 yesterday after a chemical used to treat foxhounds drained into a river and wiped out a colony of 10,000 crayfish.

Captain Ian Farquhar, Joint Master of the Beaufort Hounds, admitted responsibility for the "devastating" pollution. Captain Farquhar allowed the insecticide to be washed down a drain after it had been used to treat his 160 hounds for mange. They are kennelled at the Duke of Beaufort's Badminton Estate in Gloucestershire.

The pollution was a significant setback for a project to boost crayfish populations in England and Wales. Tony Bull, prosecuting on behalf of the Environment Agency, told magistrates at Yate, near Bristol.

Mr Bull told the court that workers at the kennels of the hunt, with which the Prince of Wales, Camilla Parker Bowles and Princess Michael of Kent have all ridden, diluted the dip to spray on the dogs. "What we had here was a total wipeout," Mr Bull said.

Captain Farquhar, 53, of Tetbury, admitted polluting, poisoning or using a noxious substance contrary to the Water Resources Act 1991.

He was also ordered to pay £665 costs.

Cleaner waters bring otters back from the brink

By Nick Nuttall,
Environment
Correspondent

Otters have secured corporate sponsors

THE otter is returning to urban areas across Britain after a marathon conservation effort that has pulled the species back from the brink.

Findings published today show that the eel and fish-eating animal can be found in or close to about 30 towns and cities after having spread from its last strongholds in Wales.

Environmentalists said they were on track to meet government targets of restoring the otter's range to pre-1960 levels by 2010. The plan will get a boost today when Michael Meacher, the Environment Minister, announces that the otter has secured the largest corporate sponsorship for an endangered British species.

The funds, believed to amount to hundreds of thousands of pounds, are from Water UK, which represents water companies in England and Wales, and Biffaward, an arm of Biffa, the waste firm. Funds for the otter recovery programme have been partly raised through a levy on rubbish going to landfill sites.

Simon Lyster, director-general of the Wildlife Trusts, which represents county groups across the country, said yesterday: "I am delighted that we have secured these conservation funds. Not just because it means we can carry on our work to restore the otter to its 1960s distribution but also because it acts as a further incentive to ensure that water companies keep up efforts to improve the quality of rivers and streams."

The otter, fabled since Viking times, was common and widespread in the 1950s but suffered an alarming decline from about 1957 because of farm pollution and habitat loss. By the late 1970s otters were almost extinct across England and parts of Wales and Scotland. But the arrival of progressively higher standards of river quality, brought about under European directives, bans on some pesticides and habitat restoration work, have brought the species back.

The latest research shows that they are living, if not yet breeding, in or within 20 miles of towns from Carmarthen, Cardiff and Liverpool in the west to Norwich, Ipswich and Maidstone in the east. And from Glasgow and Edinburgh in the north down through Leeds, Sheffield, Leicester and Birmingham to Falmouth, Plymouth and Southampton in the south.

In the past year they have been detected, mainly from droppings called sprains, in places where they have been absent for three decades, the report Splash Back says. These include east of Birmingham on the Blythe and at Stoke-on-Trent.

Dr Lyster, whose trusts are spearheading the return of the otter with the Environment Agency, said the goal now was get the otter "virtually everywhere".

Professor David Bellamy, president of the Wildlife Trusts, said: "The gradual return of the otter shows us we can turn around the fortunes of our wildlife. However, there is no room for complacency. There is still a lot of work to do and many battles to be won to ensure the otter continues to make a comeback in the next millennium."

Dr Lyster said: "It was once a terribly common animal. I want to get to a situation where I have letters on my desk from fishermen complaining the otter is a pest."

Porn scandal unearthed at top defence lab

by Steve Farrar

ONE of the biggest Internet pornography scandals in Britain has been uncovered at a top Ministry of Defence (MoD) research laboratory.

Military investigators were astonished to find staff at the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (Dera) at Malvern, in Worcestershire, had secretly downloaded from the Internet more than 170,000 pornographic images — some involving children and animals — in just three weeks.

The government scientists, who are responsible for developing battlefield technology for Britain's armed services, used 200 false identities to collect the pornography.

The investigators found that a key computer — supposed to be used to exchange research data with colleagues worldwide — had spent more than 70% of its on-line time downloading and distributing the pornographic images.

Jim Bates, a forensic computer expert who carried out an independent inquiry, said: "The sheer amount of material is staggering. I've never seen anything with such huge quantities relayed to such large numbers of people."

A security guard stumbled on the ring during a routine check at the laboratory, where 1,500 scientists and staff work. MoD police discovered staff had used a special program, called Sucker, to collect hundreds of thousands of images 24 hours a day from sexually explicit news groups. Among the news groups regularly visited were "erotica.cheerleaders", "voyeurism.hidden.cameras" and "erotica.fetish.diapers" as well as others dedicated to illegal pictures of children. Although the ring was uncovered last year, investigators have only now revealed the scandal after inquiries by The Sunday Times. Five staff have been suspended.

More than 3,500 Dera employees across Britain had access to the system containing the material, including many of the scientists involved in the development of military electronics at Malvern, where technology from thermal imaging to liquid crystal displays has been pioneered.

Bates said a lack of simple measures meant it was not possible to trace who was behind the 200 identities known to have handled the pornography. "The physical security at Dera is tremendous but the electronic security was non-existent. The way the thing was set up provided the maximum opportunity with the minimum risk of being identified," he said.

Rupert Cazalet, a Dera spokesman, said the monitoring of Internet communications was being tightened as a result of the scandal but it was important to give scientists unrestricted access. "We are embarrassed and are considering what further action should or can be taken," he said.

World population has doubled in last 40 years, says UN

BY MICHAEL BINYON, DIPLOMATIC EDITOR

ON JUNE 16 next year — give or take a few weeks — the world's population will reach six billion, a figure close to the total of all those who have ever lived on the Earth until this century. It has taken less than 40 years for the population to double from the total of three billion in 1960, and only 11 years since the total was five billion.

Announcing this yesterday, the United Nations Population Fund said that more than 80 million people were being added to the total every year, and fertility rates were not expected to stabilise at replacement level until 2055.

Current medium-fertility projections show that the total will reach 9.4 billion by 2050 and 10.8 billion a century later. The world's population will ultimately stabilise at just under 11 billion around 2200.

But even a small increase in family size could make an enormous difference. If each family has statistically half a child less than replacement level, the total in 2150 will fall to 3.6 billion; with half a child above replacement rate, it will rise to 27 billion. Asia already accounts for over half the world's population, with 3.5 billion people. Africa has 778 million, Europe 729 million and North America 304 million. In the coming years, however, the developed world will account for a smaller and smaller proportion, with only 10 per cent living in prosperous surroundings compared with 19 per cent today.

Although vigorous family planning policies are swiftly reducing the rates of increase, today's generation of young people is the largest ever recorded, with 1.16 billion people aged between 15 and 24. There are also more old people than ever before, with 560 million over 60. The rapid ageing of the world's population projects the proportion over 60 rising from 10 per cent in 1995 to 31 per cent in 2150.

In the past seven years the UN has revised its ultimate projection of 11 billion people downwards by 700,000, as contraception and family planning policies have had a greater impact than expected. But if fertility levels remain at 1990-95 levels until 2150, the global population would reach a catastrophically unsustainable 296 billion.

Wildlife to benefit from sea defences

BY NICK NUTTALL

FLOOD defences are to be built to protect some of Britain's premier wildlife sites from rising sea levels and erosion.

Elliot Morley, Parliamentary Secretary at the Ministry of Agriculture, said yesterday that the Government was introducing a scoring system to decide if an area of coastline merited funds for sea walls, beach replenishment and other forms of defence. "At the moment a nature reserve would not feature at all in the scoring because it has no economic value," he said.

Mr Morley has asked the Government's wildlife advisers and the Environment Agency to pinpoint priority sites and devise management schemes to protect them. In practice, these sites will be listed under the Habitats Directive and include special protection areas under the Birds Directive and special areas of conservation.

Mr Morley said two sites already identified as being under threat were Cley Marshes and Brancaster Marshes, both in north Norfolk. The marshes are home to rare species such as the bittern and marsh harrier and are important sites for breeding and feeding wildfowl and wading birds.

Meacher orders coastal clean-up

BY OUR ENVIRONMENT CORRESPONDENT

THE water industry was ordered yesterday to spend £1.4 billion cleaning up discharges into coastal waters. Pumping raw or partially treated sewage into 12 coastal areas will be banned.

Treatment works at sites including Hastings, Eastbourne and Littlehampton on the South Coast; Clacton-on-Sea, Essex; and Horden, Seaton and Langbaugh in the North East, will have to meet new standards by 2000. The cost will not necessarily be passed on to consumers.

Michael Meacher, the Environment Minister, also announced that treatment works covering a further 47 areas at risk from nutrient pollution — when chemicals in fertilisers trigger toxic algal blooms or infections to shellfish — will have to be upgraded to the highest European standards.

The spreading of untreated sewage sludge on to farmland is also to be phased out after concern from supermarkets about crops being contaminated.

Nine inland waters were listed as bathing waters. They are: the Serpentine in Hyde Park, London; Cotswold Water Park Lake; Frensham Great Pond, Surrey; three of Hampstead Heath's ponds; and three sites on Windermere.

Hawking's broadside at animal rights extremists

STEPHEN Hawking - the oldest living survivor of motor neurone disease - yesterday condemned animal rights extremists who attack medical research.

The 56-year-old scientist, who is wheelchair-bound and speaks through a computer controlled voice synthesiser, asked: 'Why is it worse to use animal experiments to save lives than to eat animals, which the majority of the population are happy to do?'

'I suspect extremists turn to animal rights from a lack of the more worthwhile causes of the past, like nuclear disarmament.' The disease from which the Cambridge academic suffers is incurable and kills three people each day in Britain. It causes muscles to waste, and sufferers become unable to walk, talk or feed themselves.

New laws to protect vanishing hedgerows

By MICHAEL HORNSBY, AGRICULTURE CORRESPONDENT

BRITAIN'S 232,000 miles of hedgerows, which are being dug up at a rate of more than 2,100 miles a year, are to receive stronger legal protection under proposals announced by the Government yesterday.

Michael Meacher, the Environment Minister, said that he planned regulations broadening and simplifying the criteria for deciding which hedges should be preserved. He indicated that he was in favour of extending from six to eight weeks the notice that farmers and landowners must give to local authorities of an intent to remove a hedge.

In addition, the Government would consider whether the Environment Act of 1995 should be amended to let local authorities, rather than ministers, "determine which hedgerows in their area are important and worthy of protection".

Before new regulations were introduced, he said, research would be carried out to provide a reliable estimate of what percentage of hedgerows the proposals would be likely to protect. "Hedgerows are a much-loved part of our countryside heritage, and a habitat rich in biodiversity," Mr Meacher said. "And yet the last survey, in 1993, showed that over 3,500km (2,100 miles) were being grubbed out each year."

The announcement received a qualified welcome from conservation groups, which sat with farmers and landowners on the working party that submitted the proposals to the Government. Elizabeth Cooper, of the Council for the Protection of Rural England, said: "The proposals are a step in the right direction, but inevitably, in attempting to reconcile conflicting interests they are a compromise and do not go as far as we would like."

"Many types of field boundary will still be left unprotected and, given the leisurely pace at which the Government is proceeding, it could be 18 months to two years before any new regulations or legislation take effect."

Existing regulations, introduced by the previous Conservative Government, set out complicated and narrowly drawn historical, archaeological and ecological criteria for identifying hedgerows deemed worthy of preservation. It is estimated that only about a fifth of hedgerows qualify.

The new proposals would allow local authorities to protect hedges that do not meet these strict criteria but are nonetheless regarded as an attractive and indispensable part of the regional landscape.

Conservation groups would like protection to be extended to other types of traditional field boundaries, such as the earth and stone banks topped by gorse found in Cornwall, dry-stone walls and ditches and dykes.

Historically, hedges were created to enclose fields of a size that could be worked by a horse or a man on foot. Modern machinery, such as combine harvesters, require much larger fields if they are to be used efficiently.

Last month Ian Prior, of Vowchurch, Hereford and Worcester, became the first landowner taken to court under present regulations. He was fined £2,000 and ordered to pay £4,000 in legal costs for removing nearly half a mile of medieval hedgerow.

Police are examining anonymous letters containing death threats sent to Huntingdon's chief executive, Christopher Cliffe, and to a City businessman and director of one of Huntingdon's institutional shareholders.

Huntingdon's workers and directors have been the subject of threats and demonstrations. In one incident, the Bomb Squad carried out a controlled explosion on a suspect package addressed to Mr Cliffe. Other Huntingdon shareholders have been threatened, but the company is adamant neither it nor the City will give in to what it describes as "intimidation", and views it as an attempt to close it down.

By Michael Ricks

Activists have already protested outside the Stock Exchange and tried to get the CIS to sell its holding in the company, which was last year at the centre of two documentaries and a UK government inquiry into allegations of cruelty. Two animal technicians were later given community service orders after admitting cruelty to animals and the company paid $10,000 to the US Department of Agriculture

Huntingdon Life Sciences employs 1,600 people at sites in Huntingdon, Suffolk, and Wiltshire, and has subsidiaries in Princeton in the US, and Japan. It carries out thousands of experiments and research studies for the pharmaceutical and chemical industries every year. It points out that the experiments have to be carried out to meet government product and medical safety regulations, and that no medicine can be sold without having been tested on animals.

Les Stevens, a spokesman for campaigners opposed to Huntingdon's use of animals, who denied any knowledge of the death threats, said: "We view animal experiments as torture and we are appalled that the Co-op continues to invest in companies involved in vivisection. We will be taking it up with all the shareholders. Our aim is to get them to pull out of Huntingdon, and ultimately we aim to stop Huntingdon using animals. If we can find people who own shares we will leaflet their neighbours and let them know how they are making their money."

Huntingdon says it has the confidence of its institutional shareholders, the backing of its clients, and has carried out major reforms. It also complies with all government regulations to ensure minimal animal suffering.

Rare voles get luxury burrow with canal view

By Nick Nuttall
CORRESPONDENT

DESIGNER burrows are being created along a canal to help one of the country's rarest animals, the water vole.

The burrows are being developed along the Kennet and Avon Canal: water is being drained and the structure refined under a restoration scheme funded by the National Lottery.

The work will incorporate a special "vole-friendly" bank designed by British Waterways conservation and engineering experts to allow voles to burrow into it without damaging the canal structure.

Jonathon Briggs, a British Waterways conservation ecologist, said yesterday: "This is a breakthrough in water vole conservation with major implications throughout the country."

"British Waterways' new vole-friendly bank is one of the most exciting developments in green canal restoration in years, recognising the vital importance of the post-industrial canal network to the nation's wildlife."

During the work about 30 voles are being accommodated at a "vole hotel" at the Wildfowl and Wetland Trust at Slimbridge, Gloucestershire. British Waterways will return the voles to their original home next summer.

Firm fined for raising a stink

A company was fined £370,000 yesterday for spreading a foul stench in a residential area. Minshull Street Crown Court in Manchester heard that Smith Bros, an animal by-products firm in Hyde, was now in the hands of liquidators. Residents had complained that the factory, which turned animal waste into fertiliser, spewed fumes that made them sick. The firm admitted 22 breaches of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Ten arrested as riot officers clash with 800 protesters in siege at breeding centre

POLICE fought a bloody battle yesterday with furious animal rights demonstrators day as they stormed a farm where cats are bred for experiments.

Ten were arrested and several injured as the protesters smashed windows and destroyed a roof under a hail of stones, bricks and wooden staves.

More than 800 demonstrators clashed with riot police as they laid siege to Hillgrove Farm Cattery at Witney, Oxfordshire, to mark World Day for Laboratory Animals.

The farm breeds cats for the pharmaceutical industry.

Violence replaced peaceful protest as a hard core of 300 activists used home-made battering rams to demolish a 12 ft metal fence.

One 63-year-old man was knocked unconscious after he was hit by a police riot shield.

A 32-year-old woman had a heart attack and six others received minor injuries.

Several hundred police, drafted in from other areas struggled to restore order as hundreds of protesters stormed through gaps in the perimeter fence. Mounted police were used to control the mob and a police helicopter monitored the operation.

One officer said he was sickened by the level of violence used by the demonstrators.

"It was totally over the top and clearly organised by some of the hard core animal activists associated with the Animal Liberation Front," he said.

"The violence was quite appalling and unnecessary."

However, protesters told a different story.

Iris Abrahams, a retired teacher from Hove, Sussex, said: "I have come here to protest peacefully and I turned and saw a wall of police charging towards me. They deliberately pushed into me with their shields. I'm in my fifties. This was just unprovoked."

Last night Assistant Chief Constable Tim Davidson, of Thames Valley Police, said a major criminal investigation would be launched and further arrests were expected.

Mr Davidson said: "We were promised a peaceful demo by the organisers, who said they would be linking hands to surround the farm. What we saw was violent disorder, criminal damage and police officers being subjected to violence and attacks throughout the afternoon. It was a very, very ugly afternoon."

"I gained the impression that there was a planned attack on officers and on the premises and that entry was to be gained at all costs."

Farmer Chris Brown sheltered inside his house with his wife and son as masked protesters stormed the compound.

He said: "It has been pretty terrible. The police have come under fire from thousands of stones from a rent-a-mob who had come in especially to cause trouble."

High-velocity weapons tested on live pigs uncovered by an Express investigation. An Army source said it had been going on for up to 10 years.

Young pigs are anaesthetised and strung upside down from a wooden frame, their bellies and legs crudely marked with ink targets.

They are shot at close range with high-velocity weapons and operated on while still alive. The Liberal Democrat environment spokesman Norman Baker called the exercise "repugnant" and tabled a Commons question demanding it be scrapped.

An RSPCA spokeswoman said: "It's depressing to find this sort of thing going on."

BRITISH soldiers are taking part in a barbaric training exercise where pigs are tied up and shot so that doctors can practise battlefield surgery.

The horrific treatment of the living animals is part of a war game sickeningly tagged Danish Bacon. It is carried out in Denmark because it would be banned under British law.

Politicians and animal welfare groups last night condemned the exercise, details of which have been

Drivers save firm from 40 firebombs

By Stewart Tandler

THE Army was called in yesterday to deal with more than forty firebombs found under lorries at the West Country yard of a livestock haulier.

The incendiaries were discovered by a driver who spotted a small blaze under a lorry as he arrived early for work at a yard owned by A.E. George and Sons in Bruton, Somerset. A second fire began under a cattle transporter but the driver and a colleague discovered other devices and prevented further damage by removing them.

An Army bomb disposal team was called in to neutralise the devices as police searched the yard and the surrounding area. One vehicle was badly damaged in the blaze and a second slightly damaged. The incendiaries had been left under wheel arches.

Mark George, son of the firm's owner, said: "There were at least two devices on each vehicle. Most likely it was the work of animal activists. Fortunately no one was hurt and it could have been a lot worse if our men had arrived half an hour later."

The devices were planted as the start of National Vegetarian Week.

Transport yards used by the livestock trade have been attacked by animal rights campaigners in the past. A yard in Warwickshire was attacked in January and three lorries were burnt out.

Ministers to consider three-year ban on genetically modified crops

MINISTERS are set to consider a three-year ban on the planting of genetically modified crops this month when a report is completed on their effect on wildlife, writes Paul Brown.

Yesterday the Government summoned industry representatives — including the Monsanto corporation — for talks about a voluntary code which would delay planting of such "transgenic" crops at least until 2002. Monsanto planned to start commercial planting of crops by 2000.

Recommendations from yesterday's meeting will be passed to the Environment Minister, Michael Meacher, and the Food Minister, Jeff Rooker.

English Nature, the government advisers, has urged a ban, but under European Union rules ministers cannot do so until new evidence is available to show the crops might be harmful.

Concern centres around whether the insecticides used on genetically modified crops — which kill everything except the crop — are harmful.

Permission to grow the crops was given under the last government, and Labour ministers have been under pressure to stop the commercial spread of the new varieties of wheat and maize.

Film star whale to go free

AN IDYLIC valley painted by Turner has been restored to its former beauty after being laid waste by generations of industrial pollution.

Seven years and £13 million have been spent on restoring the Derwent Valley at Swalwell, near Gateshead. Where once a two million cubic metre spoil heap stood, picnickers can again enjoy the view. Where poisonous lagoons of chemical slurry oozed into the river, kingfishers and roe deer now feed.

In 1817, when Turner visited the nearby Gibside estate, once ancestral home to Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother's family, he was able to paint two views of a picturesque country scene by the Derwent. But the valley in his pictures, on display today in the Bowes Museum in Co Durham, was already changing.

Independent body could oversee hunts

A NEW independent supervisory body looks set to govern foxhunting from this autumn.

Plans are on the drawing board after the Masters of Foxhounds Association, the sport's governing body, agreed to the formation of the body which is to be loosely modelled along the lines of the Press Complaints Commission.

The supervisory body will involve animal welfare groups, hunting groups, landowners, farmers and the judiciary. All will take part in overseeing foxhunting and ensuring laws are adhered to.

The move follows the recommendation of the independent Phelps report that foxhunting it should have an independent regulatory body rather than continue to regulate itself.

Such plans have been mooted since the Scott-Henderson report in 1951 — commissioned by the then Labour Government — concluded that hunting should be allowed to continue, but sought to have it regulated by an independent body.

"But it was never taken up by Labour because they were afraid of upsetting the farmers. They were quite happy to forget about it," said Janet George, chief executive of the Countryside Alliance. She added: "Nobody really has that much confidence in self regulation."

"This is a positive step in the right direction. Hunting has always moved with the times."

Mal Trehan, regional spokesman of the British Field Sports Society, welcomed the developments, saying the hunt operated within a strict social law as well as UK law.

Anthony Hunt, secretary for the Masters of Foxhounds Association, said the body would be in place by the autumn.

Brutal police dog handlers facing prison

By BILL MOULAND and BARBARA DAVIES

THE proud image of police dog handlers lay in tatters last night following the conviction of three officers for appalling cruelty.

Two were given jail sentences at the end of a trial which was told how alsatians were hauled off the ground by the neck and kicked in the stomach to make them obey orders.

One animal, a four-year-old called Acer, died. Another named Tazz was destroyed after it bit a kennel maid following vicious treatment.

Although the trial involved only officers from Essex, it has triggered a nationwide alarm with the RSPCA saying it will not supply dogs to any force until it is satisfied they are not at risk. A spokesman said: 'We're hoping this case is a one-off. But we have a responsibility to the dogs we rehome to ensure that it never happens again.'

Andrew Mitchell, the RSPCA chief inspector for Essex, said: 'We have received dozens of phone calls from a public outraged at what's going on. We have received threats against the officers involved. Some of the handlers who have nothing to do with this are being taunted in the streets.'

The three-week trial at Chelmsford Crown Court ended with four-month sentences for Sergeant Andrew White, 38, head of training at the police dog centre at Sandon, and instructor PC Kenneth Boorman, 45, known as 'fat little Hitler'.

TWO police dog instructors were each sentenced to four months in jail yesterday for implementing a regime of brutality at their training centre in Essex that resulted in the death of a dog.

Sergeant Andrew White and PC Kenneth Boorman were convicted of 13 offences of causing cruelty to German shepherd dogs. They were freed on bail pending appeal. Later, Charles Clark, the county's Deputy Chief Constable, said they had brought dishonour to the force.

Another instructor, PC Graham Hopkins, was convicted of one cruelty charge and ordered to do 200 hundred hours community service and pay costs of £1,000.

Inspector Graham Curtis, the officer in charge of the unit at Sandon, near Chelmsford, who had no experience of dog-handling, was cleared on three charges of failing to stop the cruelty. He had said he had no knowledge of the regime imposed by his colleagues.

The RSPCA said the men were convicted by the 'overwhelming' evidence of dog handlers who were bullied into agreeing to a regime that meant disobedient dogs were kicked and punched.

ANTI HUNT GROUP
SLAM MEDIA BIAS

■ BY SIMON MITCHELL

A Dorset-based animal rights group has spoken out against misrepresentation of anti-hunt protesters in the mainstream media.

The Southern Animal Rights Coalition claim that anti-blood-sports protesters are portrayed as being violent towards hunts though they are "in fact the true victims of hunt violence".

William Sweet of the League Against Cruel Sports, and two Hunt Saboteurs, Mike Hill and Tom Worby have been killed whilst protesting against blood-sports. "Many others have been injured or intimidated by the hunts with hardly any media attention," said a spokesman for the group.

The intimidation referred to includes property being burnt down and having fox entrails and a deer's head thrown into protester's gardens.

Sick killers chop off 19 cats' heads

A GANG of sick cat killers who chop off the animals' heads and tails are being hunted by police and RSPCA investigators.

Nineteen cats have been slaughtered in what is feared to be the ritual of a secret religious cult. The pets all died in the same gruesome way. RSPCA investigators say it is the most disgusting case of cruelty they have seen.

And they fear the toll could be higher, with owners too upset to report the horror deaths.

The killings started in May in North London but spread throughout the city and into surrounding Middlesex, Surrey and Kent.

And they are becoming more frequent. In the past month eight cats have been butchered.

Five pet rabbits have also been killed.

News from the ALF Press Office

by Robin Webb

Rather than 'News' this will be more like 'Jottings from the ALF Press Office' being written just a few days before the next episode of 'Hampshire Lunacy' (aka the conspiracy trial). I should either be free after lengthy legal arguments or set up for a 3-month hearing! Over the past years you may think I've made up some things about Detective Superintendent Desmond Thomas; I'll just quote from the writers of TV series 'The Detectives' - "We wanted to create an environment where two isolated and stupid men could act in a way that had huge consequences. We thought they were bizarre, surreal, but on three occasions we've met real policemen who've said detectives like Briggs and Louis really exist. Which is very worrying." ... meanwhile Barry Horne is on day 23 of his third hunger strike provoked by New Labour's broken promises on vivisection. Already shooting butts have been destroyed, animals freed, demos and vigils held with clearly more to come ... the animal abusers are extending their callousness further now; I received a letter containing white powder which severely affected my eyes and breathing. The accompanying note was clearly written by a vivisector so I must be doing something right! ... The BBC's policy unit has blacklisted me, causing programmes from BBC2 TV's 'Newsnight' to Radio 5 Live to cancel my appearances. The BBC World Service interviewed me but broadcast someone else reading my comments.

What a threat compassion must be to world security ... despite bans on home ground the press office has been busy with the international media - Canadian radio and American newspapers about mink releases; Belgian TV, radio and newspapers featuring ALF arson attacks on McDonald's and other 'fast food' outlets; Swedish TV working on animal rights documentaries and my impending trial - they all find it difficult to understand the sweeping censorship suffered in the United Kingdom ... we've also been busy with speeches, talks and debates, from the Animals Betrayed rally and a Hillgrove demo to a series of sixth-form conference debates at King Edward VII High School in King's Lynn ... don't forget speakers are always available from the ALF press office for meetings and demos, and it doesn't always have to be me (sigh of relief from the readers of Arkangel) ... the silly season certainly gripped the media with the mink releases but well over 60% of calls and letters to this office supported the actions. Special mention should be made of Bruce Berry from the 'owl sanctuary'. Several weeks after the first New Forest release a TV crew member told me the birds displayed as being killed by mink had come out of Berry's freezer. Anyway, Berry is a hunt supporter who kills wildlife himself ... for fun, unlike the mink who kill to survive ... 27-track album 'This is the ALF' now available from the ALF

Press Office for £11 including p&p (£12.50 overseas). In either CD format with 24-page booklet or double LP (vinyl) with gatefold sleeve, the bands featured include Conflict, Chumbawamba, Crass and A Flux Of Pink Indians ... even if you don't want the album this press office would welcome donations, particularly with the added expense of heightened international interest ... I have to ask this of the Thames Valley police - are you just trying to take the 'Lunacy' title from your Hampshire colleagues or do you really think it's better for two thousand protesters to disrupt the centre of Oxford rather than be allowed on public rights of way at Hillgrove in the middle of nowhere? Answers in a jiffy bag to (... come on, can't you take a joke?) ... and the mention of Hampshire means I've got to go and get on with preparing for the trial. In the meantime, don't forget New Labour's treachery, don't forget to support Barry Horne and - above all else - don't forget our brothers and sisters of other species who deserve our total commitment to the struggle for their freedom ... see you after the trial!

DOGMA IS WRONG

by a Green Anarchist

The following article is in response to an article entitled 'Violence is wrong' by Rabbix, which appeared in ARKANGEL 19

I must take issue with Rabbix's article 'Violence is wrong'! On a simple point of logic, he concedes: "there is little argument against..." the utilitarian case for violence put in Barry Horne's article 'Another question of violence' (Arkangel 18). He then goes on to reject it anyway because: "it says that violence is okay". He is making what's in dispute axiomatic in this, which makes reasoned debate impossible.

Rabbix makes three substantial points as to why he considers violence in pursuit of the cause of animal liberation to be wrong:

- That violence is less effective as a tactic than non-violent means.
- That it replicates the violence suffered by the animals, which he finds morally unacceptable.
- That others are likely to find it morally unacceptable, creating a smaller movement that will achieve less.

On the first point, I'd say that violence and non-violence are not bipolar opposites - a continuum runs between them. It is difficult to think of any direct action tactic used by animal libbers that is not to some extent coercive and therefore may potentially "cause psychological trauma", because by its very nature direct action is about thwarting the will of the person that it's taken against. Instead of dogmatically imposing a non-existent dualism on the movement, we should talk about what's most effective and that is something which can only really be decided case by case. Perhaps, to take Rabbix's example, whipping a huntsman might scare him enough not to return to the field, but it might have the opposite effect of making him more determined, or have no effect whatsoever. It all depends on the huntsman. There are no practical reasons to preclude such tactics when we think they are likely to be effective.

On the second point, one of the first lessons any revolutionary must learn is not to equate the violence of the oppressor with that of the oppressed. To do so is immoral, because it perpetuates the oppressor's violence where, using the criteria above, an occasion arises where it's shown to be most practically effective to meet that violence head-on. The other side of the coin is that there would be no need for the violence of the oppressed if it wasn't being used to defend ourselves and our animal comrades from our oppressors. When the oppression ends, so does anyone's need to resort to violence.

On the last point, I've shown above that there are occasions when it is both practical and principled to use violence and others should accept this if they share our situation and perspective. Sure, propaganda and preconceptions about passively accepting the oppressor's violence do exist, but everyone going around dogmatically insisting this is justified in the name of 'non-violence' is effectively mystifying the situation and perpetuating the oppressor's monopoly of violence. As above, context is all: for example, the rituals of non-violence are de rigueur on most peace demos but a total liability in anti-fascist work.

Rabbix's article raises two other substantial points:

- That well-intentioned people should be supported whatever action they've taken.
- That we need to establish limits as to who should or who should not be targeted.

The first point is laudable enough and I see no point debating it here. The second point illustrates a misanthropic pathology that's a real liability to the animal liberation movement. I don't think everyone's a potential oppressor but to treat everyone that is as an enemy is just a way for self-satisfied adolescents such as 'Screaming wolf' to feel superior to everyone else, rather than for achieving animal liberation. This is not a question of violence or non-violence - it applies equally to both - but a way around the 'who is really innocent?' question is to apply the practicality criteria above. What action is most likely to achieve the best result with the resources available in any particular situation? I'd suggest - on economies of scales, if nothing else - that this criteria means the big institutions, factories, etc. end up getting prioritised for social change rather than old grannies putting milk in their tea. By changing the biggest things we can manage, we can change the smaller ones dependent on them too, making questions of lifestyle less important (vegan police, please take note!) The biggest thing we need to change is, of course, the totality of Civilisation itself and to change that will need a revolution. That'll mean linking in with a broad range of struggles beyond animal liberation alone - likely to happen anyway on an 'economy of scale' principal - but how to make the whole revolution is rather beyond the scope of this short piece!

The National Vegan Festival

by Robin Lane

On the 13th September, over 1000 people attended the first National Vegan Festival, which was held in Central London. The event, which was sponsored by the Vegan Society, CALF, Vegan Village, Alex Bourke and Arkangel, featured 36 stallholders and speakers on subjects ranging from vegan nutrition and raw foods to animal rights. There was also music, an art exhibition, a children's party, a salad demonstration and fashion show staged by the Hemp Collective. A good selection of food was provided by Daisies Catering.

CALF and the organisers, who administered the event, had hoped to appeal to a wide range of people from all over the country and this was achieved with meat eaters, vegetarians and vegans travelling from as far and wide as Bristol, Sheffield, Dorset, Devon and Wales. The Festival was an overwhelming success attracting many more people than expected. Therefore, the organisers would like to apologise to those who had to wait in the long queue for food, but most people were patient and we thank those of you who were.

Stallholders generally had a very successful day. The Vegan Society took approximately £2,500 and gained 34 new members. Other stallholders included VIVA!, Vegfam, Movement for Compassionate Living, Plants for a Future, ALFSG, Ethical Wares, Veganline, PETA and Uncaged Campaigns. Plamil Foods, Cook's Delight, CALF, Vegan Prisoners Support Group, Leaves of Life, Veggies and Gina's raw food juices provided snacks, drinks and cakes. The bar, run by the Beer Shop, provided alcoholic drinks including Eco-Warrior beer, which sold out!

In the small hall, there was a creative salad making demonstration followed by a children's party co-ordinated by The Vegan Families Network. Over 80 children attended the party, which included a puppet-making workshop. The organisers would like to thank the London Vegans volunteers who worked extremely hard on the day, the musicians, Benjamin for reciting his poetry, the speakers, and all those who attended, for making the Festival a great success.

Alle Dieren Vrij

Alle Dieren Vrij (All Animals Free) is an Anarchic, Vegan, Info, Action, Cooking and Writing Collective in Germany. The collective was recently founded and its aims include: translating information from Germany and the UK about animal liberation and veganism; fighting animal abuse (ie. circuses, dolphin parks, etc); setting up an educational program about veganism / anarchism for schools; and fighting vivisection, hunting and fishing for sport and the genetic manipulation of animals. They also seek to create workshops with their organic / vegan mobile kitchen. At the moment they are gathering information and working out different ways to deal with these subjects. Live Exports Escalate

Brindie Ltd is the current company exporting thousands of lambs, sheep and pigs each week from Dover on the MV Caroline. During the month of July 1998 approximately 40,000 were shipped from Dover.

The Farmers Ferry are buying out Brindie, so far £700,000 having been raised from sheep farmers, dairy fanners are also being asked to fund the service, £2.00 per cow is the price requested from the 28,000 registered producers. When the beef ban is lifted it is not just a possibility, but a reality that the service will be extended to include calves. It appears that producers don't want the costs of having to rear calves for six months, so will be pressing to send them at four to five weeks old. It is expected that Farmers Ferry will start trading shortly (perhaps before this goes to print). When it does, the trade will escalate, approximately 10,000 animals a day - over 60,000 animals a week.

Mutilation

Before animals start the long arduous death journey to hell, numerous animals will have suffered, in many ways. Idyllic scenes of animals grazing in the fields belie the appalling misery and suffering behind the scenes. Mutilation, castration, tail docking, all done without anaesthetic, some haemorrhage from surgical castration. At shearing time many sheep are badly cut. Lambs are slaughtered as young as three months old, torn from their mothers and visa-versa. Animals bleat pitifully for days for mother or off-spring as does the cow for her calf. (And much more.)

Summer or Winter, there is no respite from searing temperatures or bitter conditions. In many fields during heavy rains sheep can be seen standing knee deep in a quagmire of mud and water. Food can be scant on hill farms. There are numerous reports of cruelty and neglect on farms.

Market Violence

The brutality inflicted on farm animals does not just happen abroad, it happens here before slaughter - at markets before the gruelling journey to Europe. Most markets are a hellish nightmare for animals, markets are where depraved thugs love the power, the control, tormenting already traumatised animals. The uncalled for barbarity inflicted on lambs, sheep, pigs, cows and calves makes a total farce of the saying - animals should be killed humanely in this country - they are not even treated humanely at any time before death.

Haunting Images

Documented video evidence reveals terrified, bewildered animals forcefully and viciously beaten time and time again - across the face & head, by thugs wielding sticks. Feeble calves a few days old are smacked, bashed on the head and face, kicked, and shunted to the ground. Animals in the sale ring, including dams with their calves, are kept moving twisting and turning, by the use of sticks. Animals are treated with hatred and contempt. Innocent helpless beings are repeatedly shunted, kicked, shoved, callously beaten, dragged, picked up by their tails, ears and fleece. Sharp sticks are poked into the ribs and genital areas. Pigs are battered with metal boards.

A Long Way to Die

Added to this - animals are bullied onto transporters for the hideous death journey to the hellholes of Spain, Italy or Greece and beyond. It now appears that lambs are being shipped from here right across France to Marseille and then on to Algeria to be ritually slaughtered. Where next? - After animals spend 24 hours on French soil they become French animals. Soon we will be on a par with Australia.

Pigs travel from afar afield as Ireland to Dover to wherever. Recently, temperatures in Spain have been as high as 40C (104F). Legally, lambs can travel for 14 hours with a one hour stop then continue for a further 14 hours. They do not come off the transporter during that one hour stop (28 hours confined). Numerous sheep and lambs have been forced to endure 80 hours (2000 miles or more) in filthy, stinking trucks. Jolted, bewildered and frightened, on their feet, in the heat, without water, food or rest. After a punishing journey, panic-stricken survivors, dazed and disorientated, demented by thirst, and suffering from heat exhaustion and fatigue, stagger off transporters at the slaughterhouse only to be met by more violence. Sick and injured animals are kicked, beaten and dragged by a chain attached to their back leg to their Merciless death. Animals have been stabbed in the neck with screwdrivers, been hacked to death - shackled and dying lambs try to raise their heads after their throats are slit - sputtering and choking on their own blood. It is systematic brutality on a monumental scale.

Betrayed?

Have the farm animals been betrayed, forgotten - where is the Spirit of Shoreham, Coventry, Brightlingsea and Plymouth - where is the passion, the tears and determination? Please help us revitalize that wonderful spirit. Millions of animals are awaiting your voice and strength. It is often said that Dover is "too far - nothing is too far, or too horrific, for the animals gasping and dying for air on transporters. Exporters like Stephen Woods continue to line their pockets, accumulating their wealth from the appalling suffering.

Live Exports Update

The boat from "Hell" continues to return from Dunkirk to Dover, having carried thousands of lambs and sheep to their hell holes of Europe, at present three days a week.

On Friday 9th October we watched 23 transporters, some with trailers, carrying approximately 12,000 animals - LE Jones (Wales) - Machin (Yorkshire) - Cooper (Worcs.) and many Dutch transporters. The people demonstrating their abhorrence on this day could be counted on two hands, other days on one.

Dover shipments from 14th August to 9th October - in just 22 shipment days, on 373 death trucks (with two rejected), approximately 230,000 animals passed through Dover. Regular protests were held every Thursday night (7.30pm) at the Redditch Lairage on the A441 near the sports centre - look for the purple ribbons which grace the hedgerows.

The flame of determination for these animals has died, please help us rekindle it - a Torch of Hope at Dover and the lairages.

In October, Machin was found guilty of 369 charges of breaching government regulations on Animal Welfare transportation. He is still exporting animals with the Farmers Ferry, who boasted when they came into being, that anyone who broke the rules would not be allowed to sail with them. Well, Machin is still sailing with them and is one of their biggest customers.

For The Wild Ones

by Ben

As the mists were rising from the woods not long after dawn through the trees, carried on the breeze came the fearful sound of the horn.

And the wild one she froze still she knew the meaning of this sound she searched around for a place to hide for soon there would be hounds.

But quicker than she'd reckoned over the hill they came as the terror rose inside her she was thrown into the game.

The hounds went into cry now as through the fields she ran the redcoats cried excitedly and so the chase began.

Now after quite some time pursued her heart was beating fast though her flight had been a good one not much longer could it last.

To lie down her weary body no secret places could she find now her ears were filled with the baying of the hunters close behind.

The wild one turned to face her foe but the hounds had turned away for she had friends that were helping her that cold and wintry day.

Her trail had been well covered to spoil the huntsmens' fun the hounds now followed a different call which gave her time to run.

And so she found her hiding place now she would not be caught for her helpers were determined to disrupt this evil sport.

The ritual abuse of the wild ones we feel we must confront we'll make sure they stay proud and free as we sabotage the hunt.

Though their influence is strong so they can carry on at will never will they have free reign to terrorise and kill.

The men of broken promises and great hypocrisy won't stop this foul tradition
SO IT IS UP TO YOU AND ME!

APE

(Animals, People and the Environment)

APE is organised by Joan Court, a Cambridge veteran campaigner for animal rights and welfare who has also had extensive experience as a nurse / midwife working in developing nations.

APE is an attempt to bring together grass roots activists and individuals who are troubled by the destruction of the planet, so that they can learn about each other's concerns and how they are interlinked. We must recognise that animals and people suffer and that the environment that supports us all is being globally destroyed.

A programme of talks by experts on global agriculture, genetic engineering, the arms trade and liberation movements, etc, have been taking place since June. The group aims to organise and support campaigns and direct non-violent protests on these and other issues which fall within its remit.

The group affirms that we should live as if there is still hope and welcome all those who care about life on this planet.

STOP QUINTILES' Animal Tests

Quintiles laboratory in Ledbury (Herefords) is a contract testing lab which tests all manner of substances, including cosmetics and household products, as well as drugs, on such animals as rats, mice, rabbits and beagles.

Protests against the lab began about 20 years ago, when it was known as Toxicol, but these were very sporadic and had little effect, with the exception of an ALF raid where rabbits were rescued and photos taken for use in a BUAV campaign.

In 1992, Toxicol was taken over by the giant multinational Quintiles company (HQ in the USA), which refers to itself as a 'contract pharmaceutical organisation', and the name of the lab was changed to reflect this.

In 1997, some animal rights campaigners who had been demonstrating against animal experiments at Quintiles decided to step up the campaign and a group called Stop Quintiles' Animal Tests (SQAT) was formed.

In the past 18 months the lab has been picketed at least once a week and there have been several larger 'national' demonstrations there. Leaflets have been distributed door-to-door in Ledbury to increase local opposition to animal experiments at Quintiles and SQAT street stalls have been held in Ledbury and other towns in the area.

Despite the fact that those involved in the SQAT campaign are quite few in numbers, a reasonable amount of success has so far been achieved. Several Quintiles workers (some of them quite senior) have left their employment at the lab because of 'fear' of AR campaigners, and Quintiles has stated that some of its security staff (who now no longer work for the company) have had to undergo counselling because of the stress caused to them by the demonstrations. Quintiles has also had to spend a fortune on increased security at the lab, with expensive security fencing erected and improved surveillance cameras installed.

Quintiles have offices and laboratories in many countries throughout the world, but claim to only carry out animal experiments in the UK. SQAT is attempting to find out whether this is true or not, but in any event it does seem that animal experiments only form a relatively small part of the massive Quintiles empire.

For this reason it shouldn't be too difficult to persuade the company to give up animal testing, provided sufficient pressure could be brought to bear. If a small area of its activities begins to cause a lot of aggro to the company, then it seems quite possible that Quintiles would relinquish that small area in order to carry on with its hugely profitable business unmolested.

The administration HQ of Quintiles (UK) is at Bracknell in Berkshire, where the company has two large office buildings. SQAT is aiming to start protests there in the near future.

SQAT is also in the process of making contact with AR activists in other countries where Quintiles has offices and laboratories. It is hoped that protests can be organised at these in order to put more pressure on the company to stop its animal experiments at Ledbury. This will include an international day of action against Quintiles' animal tests sometime next year, with demos being held at Quintiles' premises in several different countries.

The names and addresses of directors of Quintiles (UK) have been obtained and SQAT is looking into all lawful means of bringing pressure to bear on them to stop the animal experiments.

If you can help the campaign against Quintiles' animal tests in any way, please contact SQAT at:

HUNTINGDON DEATH SCIENCES CAMPAIGN

Huntingdon Life Sciences run the biggest contract testing laboratory in the UK. Its role is to provide independent research facilities for chemical, pharmaceutical, food, agricultural and cosmetic industries. In plain English, this means they will test anything for anyone that will pay them.

The laboratory uses baboons, macaque and rhesus monkeys, beagle dogs, rabbits, guinea-pigs, birds, fish, farm animals and thousands of rodents in their barbaric experiments.

In 1997, two undercover investigators (one in the UK and one in the USA) filmed HLS employees punching beagle dogs, throwing monkeys into cages, not using anaesthetic whilst conducting horrendous experiments and not providing even a basic level of veterinary care for the animals they imprison.

The shocking video footage they obtained caused a public outcry and consequently lost HLS many of their clients. The animal rights campaign that followed made sure HLS were never out of the media spotlight.

Huntingdon Death Sciences Campaign have been conducting a hard hitting and relentless campaign against HLS. If you would like to get involved or just want some more information, please write to:

RAW FOODISM explained...

by John Coleman

A 'raw foodist' may be defined as a person who eats a diet consisting only of uncooked, unrefined or otherwise processed foods, such as: untreated fruits, nuts/seeds and vegetables. Freshly squeezed juices may also be considered raw foods.

There are many different kinds of raw food diet, with many different ideas for choosing them. The reasons vary from one person to another, but may include the following benefits: superior levels of health and happiness, energy and time savings, less destructive to environment, wonderful flavours, unwillingness to support the addictive food processing industries, better awareness and levels of consciousness, reduced needs for sleep, return of instinctive human traits, and many others. We also save animals by not promoting the destruction of their habitats, an inherent part of arable systems.

My own diet consists primarily of organic fruits with the addition of lettuce and sometimes some vegetable fruit juices plus wild food, and food from my own fruit and vegetable garden. I have undergone a complete change in my views about what constitutes food, as I no longer find cooked and processed foods to be attractive at all. In fact many cooked and processed foods now smell offensive to me and are highly unappealing. I found it very hard to quit bread and other grain products, concluding, as many others have, that they are addictive. Over the years during which I swapped to this diet, numerous ailments have ceased, and I never get colds. Indeed, I now know that this common symptom of a diseased body, is caused by pollution, chiefly the ingesting of high protein content, refined and processed edible commodities, which are not food in any real biological sense. The greater majority of people that eat unnatural foods endure years of disease and suffering and soon become willing guinea pigs in the pharmaceutical industries' appalling experiments with the public. Other people succumb to more traditional 'remedies' involving less injurious substances such as herbs and so forth.

I have been studying nutrition for 9 years now, and latterly I have focused entirely on evolutionary theory as a rationale for choosing the raw food diet. Basically, humans are close genetic relatives to a primate known as the bonobo. This chimpanzee-like ape eats a predominantly fruit diet, but also includes some piths, foliage and a very small amount of animal foods. Of course, humans are not quite identical to these apes and our nutritional needs are somewhat different. BUT there is no rational concept available to suggest that this difference extends to ingesting unnatural substances of recent human invention. It is a generally accepted fact in evolutionary theory, that animals are only adapted to the conditions of their ancient ancestors, and not to the contemporary environmental conditions. The most successful animals are those which most closely live in conditions which match those of their ancestors. This explains why, after a while, raw foodists find the pseudo, alleged, 'foods', eaten by the mass population to be unattractive. All humans are 'raw foodists' in the genetic sense, and we never have adapted, or could adapt to culinary atrocities now considered the finest 'foods'. Once the natural animal instincts return the poorer, and often repulsive, tastes of these items becomes obvious. Other powerful animal instincts may also return. The addiction to modern foods is an obvious example of 'maladaptation' and has nothing to do with nutritional necessity.

If humanity is to gain a better understanding of Life and our relationship to Nature, then it must return to its natural feeding behaviours, forever dispensing with the errors of food adulteration and the ill-conceived practice of eating such unwholesome substances as breads, sugars, chocolate and any manner of chemical wastes. The building of healthy humans can only be based upon the foundations of 'Natural Law', which means eating wild, raw foods. In the purely chemical sense, humans who eat chemical waste are chemical waste humans. The fact that modern diets cannot produce any healthy, fully formed humans is an undeniably true observation, as is the fact that all the wild animals on the planet who remain eating their natural raw foods, in suitable environments, do not suffer from the countless degenerative diseases of humans. For example, tooth decay is rampant in modern humans, but unknown in wild animals and humans who were well breast fed and avoided processed foods.

It is a physical impossibility to produce a correctly functioning human being from anything other than human breast milk, and then fruits and other raw plant foods. Ignorance of this fact, and the resulting lifestyle errors, are the best part of the reason why humans have degenerated so much physically and mentally. There are no other species on this earth who wantonly destroy themselves and their own ecosystem, and who systematically exploits its own offspring along with numerous other species. The reason why humans do this is their practice of destroying their minds by damaging them with cooked foods.

Almost amusingly, many meat addicted humans claim to be 'carnivores', yet real carnivores eat bloody, freshly killed animal flesh which is RAW. The raw foodist philosophy overturns many nutritional dogmas with ease and is certainly not a 'fad', not unless all previous human evolution on wild uncooked foods was similarly a 'fad', or unless all other species of life are similarly prone to dietary fads. Thus it is obvious that all human cultural culinary practices are in fact the fads.

In the light of the above claims, and self-evident truths, you may wish to seek more information about this holistic paradigm, and how you may benefit yourself and everything else by following it. We are becoming horribly degenerated as we eat increasingly toxic substances, fast foods and other such filth, thus increasing our detachment to Nature, with the inevitable result of eco-destruction, wars and massive suffering. Human Nature is beautiful, and is something that only humans who live naturally exhibit, and the sooner we return to this pattern of life, the sooner things will get better.

NEW STUDY SHOWS CRUELTY OF KILLING MINK FOR FUR

A report recently published in Veterinary Record magazine again slams the use of carbon dioxide for killing mink for fur. The report, one part of a 3 year study into various aspect of fur farming, was carried out at Oxford University to determine the aversion of farmed mink to the gas.

In November 1997 investigators from the Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade secretly filmed the gassing of mink with CO₂ at a Newcastle mink farm. CO₂ has been criticised for years for being inhumane. It is a pungent gas that causes breathlessness, hyperventilation and attempts to escape. The gas is pumped into a large wooden box and the mink put in to die. A veterinary manual detailing mink husbandry says that CO₂ gassing of mink is "not considered to be humane". As it is reversible and mink are killed without being bled (so as not to damage the pelt) each animal is supposed to be checked on removal from the box. The footage taken by CAFT shows this does not happen.

Despite these facts the UK's leading fur farms use this method. Four of the 15 mink farms used it last year, and three of these are amongst the most prominent. They are: Mike Cobbledick of Cornwall, the UK's largest mink farm and self-appointed spokesperson for the fur farming industry; Peter Harrison of Newcastle, a director of the British Fur Trade Association; and Len Kelsall, Chair of the UK Fur Breeders Association and owner of the Staffordshire farm where mink were released in September.

The Veterinary Record study concludes that "...mink killed with high concentrations of carbon dioxide would be exposed to the discomfort caused by the inhalation of the gas for short periods. The practice is, therefore, questionable on welfare grounds, especially as potentially less aversive alternatives are available."

Following the report, CAFT called upon the government to immediately ban the use of CO₂ on UK fur farms. CAFT is totally opposed to all fur farming and is calling for its banning immediately, but until that happens feels that CO₂ gassing should be banned.

Their House

'Their House' is a house with two rooms plus kitchen and bathroom, storeroom and large toolshed, and with a large garden. It is situated in Loutsá, 8 minutes walk from the sea, two hours from the centre of Athens. It offers all the facilities of modern life, in moderation. 'Their House' has been rented to house 12 dogs and 35 cats all rescued from the streets or survivors from accidents. 'Their House' costs a small fortune for its upkeep.

I am overworked and my health is deteriorating (I am 50 years old). I have decided to ask for help. I need two dedicated, animal loving and animal-minded people, preferably a couple who will stay and work here for at least one year. The status of the people who will come will be that of semi-volunteer workers.

I offer 150,000drs for the two of them, (basic wage in Greece for one person ranges from 100,000-120,000drs). Rent is, of course, paid by me, as well as bills. Telephone up to 15,000drs per two months. The basic staple foods will be available from me. Vegetarians / vegans will have no difficulty with their food, quite the contrary. I will also supply working clothes. After a period of three months, one weekend or two separate days per month will be free. In the meantime, small outings in Athens and nearby spots are a possibility, as long as the work is being done and my animals are well taken care of.

A return air ticket will be offered by me of two months duration, to cover the case of dissatisfaction of both sides. But let me say that the choice will be meticulous and very, very careful. This is what I offer.

My requirements:

- People who are genuine animal lovers and not adventure or sex seekers.
- People who are at least 25 years of age.
- A CV with basic particulars.
- At least two references from authorised bodies.
- Photographs.
- People who are not unwilling to handle meat and fish.
- Moderate, peaceful, non-violent people, who will react peacefully to anything that is against the rights of animals. No strong words, no fists.
- Non-drinkers.
- Very careful smokers.

Applicants should write to:

Maria Tsatsou,
c/o 'NEFELI' Publishing, 6 Asklipiou St, Athens 10680, Greece.

and:

Ms Christine Morrison, 9 Woodfield Crescent,
London W5 1PB.

Ms. Morrison has founded the organisation 'Friends of the Cat', to help spay and preserve the population of stray cats in Greece. She knows the country and its needs very well and can answer all queries. She also knows me and my efforts over the years. She has kindly accepted to interview all serious applicants. Therefore, the final decision will be carried out by both of us. Please write to both of us as soon as you can, because time is pressing.

Sincerely yours,
Maria Tsatsou

ALPHABETICAL INDEX . ABOUT US
www.veganvillage.co.uk

The vegan village was set up as a website on the internet as this is a cheap way of sharing information with a very large audience. It started with a listing of 44 companies and has grown steadily, adding around 8 new companies a month. It now lists over 150 companies and groups in the UK which are run by vegans on vegan principles - including restaurants and guest houses which only serve vegan food; shops which only sell vegan products; books written by vegans; vegan bakers; vegan solicitors; vegan natural healers...

We have seen many different results of our work with the vegan village, some which we expected and some which we didn't. We have found that some vegan products can be sold internationally using the internet. We have seen many vegan consumers express a preference for buying from vegan companies. We have also seen new businesses being set up and run on vegan principles.

Part of the work of the vegan village is to help vegan companies make use of the internet. We have designed websites for more than 20 vegan companies and have provided internet and marketing consulting services for others. As a rule, vegan companies do not want to take over the world and do not want to waste money on flashy advertising and packaging, but they do need to let everyone know that they are there.

We have had some encouraging success stories as a result of the work that we have done. For example, a Canadian broadcaster saw Vegfam's details on the vegan village and contacted them, resulting in a live telephone interview on Canadian radio. The website that we developed for Ethical Wares has attracted over 7,000 visitors and receives credit card orders for their products from all over the world.

The vegan village website has evolved over the year to include a noticeboard where people can place a free advert to be seen by other vegans. There is a newstand which features sample articles from the various vegan publications that are available - the idea being that you can "try before you buy". There are links to vegan websites all over the world, and a very popular "residential" area which has links to the homepages of vegans in the UK. Of course, no vegan venture would be complete without some reference to recipes, so we have a recipe of the week section which features a tried and tested delicacy - our favourites being things that don't sound vegan such as gravy, pancakes, and "milk shakes"!

One of the great advantages of the internet is that information can be updated easily at negligible cost. The vegan village is updated at least once a week and sometimes even a couple of times a day. However, we have found a demand from people who do not have internet access and as a result have produced a vegan village booklet. We also produce a monthly newsletter for the people who are listed on the vegan village.

The vegan village attracted over 25,000 "visitors" in its first year. The number of people looking at the website has increased steadily month on month since it started and it currently attracts almost 4,000 people a month. We were proud to be one of the sponsors of the First National Vegan Festival, and we have also sponsored the new Yorkshire Vegans group.

The vegan village plans for the coming year involve attracting even more visitors to the website, with the aim of encouraging people to think about where their money is going - to vote with their wallet and support vegan companies.

Turkey & Broiler Breeders Association Conference Report

On the 5th October at Chilford Hall, Linton, Cambridge, the Turkey & Broiler Breeders Association Conference took place and about 10 animal rights campaigners from the Cambridge area, armed with posters and leaflets, arrived just as the stalls were being set up.

The protesters stood outside the conference hall for a photocall by the Cambridge Evening News. Everyone involved with the conference was very surprised and eventually the person in charge informed the protesters that they were on private property and they were asked to move to the bottom of the driveway (about a mile down the road!). They refused and explained very politely why they were there and showed him what goes on in the poultry industry. He said that it had nothing to do with him and that he was only in charge of the conference centre.

The protesters then went into the hall and collected pamphlets and leaflets from the exhibitors' tables and spoke of their concerns with the poultry industry. Needless to say, they were either ignored or told to get their facts right and of course the obligatory: "What about human suffering?" One of the pamphlets collected was from ANTEC INTERNATIONAL whose main concern is disease control and their pamphlet informs the poultry industry that the cost of disease in the UK alone is a staggering £130 million every year! The ironic thing is, of course, that the industry would probably go out of business should the conditions be drastically improved for the birds.

The protesters took the opportunity to use an empty table to set out their own literature before being asked, once again, to leave the building. They were reminded that the cost of a stall was £350 and after offering to pay by cheque the organiser called the police.

After a short while a friendly woman PC arrived and asked them to pack up their leaflets, etc. (whilst taking some for herself). The protesters continued at the bottom of the drive as exhibitors were now arriving at the conference centre. A large number of leaflets were given out.

The protesters would like to thank those who helped with the press release and for supplying the literature so swiftly.

A small piece appeared in the Cambridge Evening News regarding the protest.

'Rage & Reason' - a novel by Michael Tobias

Reviewed by Keith Mann

If you want to lose yourself in the ultimate fantasy of retribution for tormented animals then get yourself a copy of Rage & Reason. If animal abusers think they have something to whinge about then they ought to check out a copy too and they'll see just how bad things could get - they might then start to appreciate the admirable restraint of the ALF and stop whimpering about 'terrorism'.

I had never heard of Michael Tobias and I didn't have any idea he was at all engrossed in the finer details of animal abuse and the urge for drastic action which the intimate knowledge of leads to in sensitive souls, but deep he does delve.

Two US Special Forces veterans, Felham and Muppet, find they've learnt too much to live with and decide there's no good reason why their enemy - our enemy - should continue. They therefore go on an intercontinental tour of nastiness and do what they feel is appropriate.

Some might be perturbed at the paramilitary excesses of this novel, which could be accused of genetically engineering ALF activists with Rambo genes and lending weight to the oft-touted view of animal activists as terrorists. But it is only a novel and the most appealing aspect from my point of view is the graphic tour of our heroes' motivation. OK, the furrier skinned alive, the carnage of lab technicians and the massacre of hunters in the wilds of Maine does give the story an edge, but the point made is that the reader is left in no doubt about the reasons for these extremes!

Important issues are covered; it's a good story and it has a feel-good factor.

Obituaries

Chris Newman

It is with great sadness that I write of the death of Christine Newman who died from breast cancer on the 18th June 1998. Chris, along with her partner Mike, ran the Ethical Wares company and the two of them built Ethical Wares into a very successful business while never letting their commitment to promoting veganism wane. Chris, a Bach flower therapist, made her compassionate healing skills available to people and animals alike. She dealt with her illness in her own way, keeping it a secret from those who might be dismayed by the knowledge or might try to bring pressure on her to betray her alternative therapies.

Chris will be greatly missed and our hearts go out to Mike. If you would like to make a donation in Chris' name, please send it to the:

Many were saddened at the unexpected news of the death of Frances Howard, co-founder of Vegfam, on 1st August 1998. She was a great inspiration to the vegan movement and worked tirelessly to promote not only veganism, but also many other causes, which she embraced with determination. She will be sadly missed.

OPERATION BITEBACK CONTINUES

THE INTERNATIONAL STRUGGLE AGAINST THE FUR TRADE

1998 has been a year that the worldwide fur industry will never forget. The Animal Liberation movement has the trade on the run, and looks set to achieve its aim of destroying the fur farming, manufacturing, marketing and retail sectors. A quick look at the list of anti-fur actions shows that there appears to be a fur shop trashed, a fur farm raided, or a fur retail vehicle torched virtually every night somewhere across the globe. Hotbeds of activity are certainly Finland, Sweden and the United States. These countries are leading the way with raids on fur farms, and they all have plenty to choose from. These actions appear to have encouraged activists across the UK, Germany, Austria and Holland to also pay nocturnal visits to fur farms. In the UK, 6,000 mink were released from a farm in the New Forest on 7th August, with a further 1,000 given freedom a week later. This was followed on 17th September when 8,000 mink were released from a Staffordshire fur farm and 2 vehicles outside the owners home were trashed.

These actions have been met with increasing violence from the fur farmers. Animal Liberationists have declared a non-violent war on the fur industry, but farmers have reacted with a violent war against activists. It all started last December when 5 Finnish activists, allegedly planning to spray foxes with a harmless henna dye to ruin their pelts, were shot by farmer Markku Kuisma. Kuisma appeared on TV boasting about how he shot the unarmed activists, hitting one in the lower back, another 5 times in the arms and legs, and another 9 times with one bullet going through his lung. They were all running away at the time. Thankfully the activists all survived and Kuisma has now been charged with 3 counts of attempted manslaughter and his farm closed down in September.

Also in September, Finnish fur farmers posed in balaclavas and overalls with ropes and guns in front of sheds imprisoning animals for their fur. The photo was printed in newspapers and the farmers declared the area of Osterbotten a 'terrorist free area'. Fed up with the lack of police action, the farmers threatened to shoot anyone on their property. These threats coincided with those made by US farmers, threatening violence against liberators. One statement said that, "Warning shots are a waste of shells," and recommended that if you catch an activist, you should wet them and push them in the freezer! Activists saw through this crap however and continue to rescue fur-bearing animals from their prisons and cause economic sabotage to the tools of torture and death.

Within a week of the Finnish threats, 200 foxes and 500 mink were released from 2 farms, and a week later 300 foxes were dyed, with activists stating, "While FurScum is talking their shit and posing with balaclavas and guns in the media, EVR [ALF] strikes again!"

Although several people have been arrested and imprisoned or fined in the US, Finland and Sweden for anti-fur actions, this only appears to spur others on. A Finnish raid on October 11th, in which 200 racoon dogs were freed, 400 foxes dyed and a killing machine destroyed, was dedicated to hunger striker Barry Horne. A raid liberating 400 mink in Sweden on 19th September was dedicated to US activists arrested for mink raids. An arson attack on empty sheds at a West Yorkshire, UK, fur farm back in February was done in support of US activists charged with causing $1m damage to a Fur Breeders Co-operative.

Criticism has been levelled against UK fur farm raids for 2 reasons: First, the alleged environmental damage caused by mink (this is discussed in detail elsewhere in this issue), and secondly, because the Government has already pledged to ban fur farming. It is true that Labour have stated that they intend to ban fur farming, but they said a lot of things before the election and many appear to be downright lies. Labour's pre-election pledge was to ban fur farming "as soon as is practicable." Great. But what happened? When exactly is "as soon as practicable"? At the time of writing Labour have been in power for one and half years. Last winter 100,000 mink were killed on UK farms for their fur. Under a Labour Government. In May this year mink gave birth to kits on UK fur farms. Under a Labour Government. Throughout the past year investigators from the Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade (CAFT) have filmed stereotypic behaviour, cannibalism and self-mutilation, and the killing by carbon dioxide on UK fur farms. Under a Labour Government. In November another 100,000 mink will be gassed or lethally injected on UK fur farms. Under a Labour Government. So just when is "as soon as practicable"?

Most anti-fur groups thought that last December was the most practicable time for banning fur farming. The Mink Keeping Order, not a welfare measure but designed to prevent mink escaping, was due for its five-yearly renewal. In the past, governments have offered an option of prohibiting fur farming. Although this was removed from the proposals for the Order renewal in 1992, Labour decided not to offer it again. They did offer to prohibit new farms setting up and stop the farming of arctic foxes, sable, fisher and racoon dog. But no mention was ever made of those proposals again, and CAFT could never find out what happened there, even when an MP approached the Government on our behalf. Instead they renewed the Order for another 3 years and said that they "hoped" no fur farms would exist by 2001. Perhaps Tony 'Trust Me' Blair is waiting for the genie to appear from the magic lamp and make his wish come true.

Earlier this year Lib Dem MP Norman Baker introduced a Private Member's Bill to ban fur farming by 2001 (allowing a phase out period to avoid paying compensation). The Government blocked progress of the Bill and it died a death. On 30th July (3 weeks after the Government stopped Baker's Bill), Elliot Morley told the House of Commons: "it is the Government's firm intention to end fur farming in this country ... I want to make absolutely clear our commitment to bringing it to an end through legislation". More fine words, but again completely meaningless. The fact of the matter is that the Government refuses to say when or how they will ban fur farming. Those having meetings with the Government have told CAFT not to expect any news this year or next but that a deadline of 2001 looks likely. We don't think it's good enough. And the animals on the 15 remaining mink farms seem to have another few years of miserable existence in bare wire cages ending in a brutal death. Unless anyone else can offer them an alternative, that is.

Please help CAFT end the fur trade. We help co-ordinate campaigns across the UK, and currently there are campaigns against 5 mink farms as well as fur shops. We carry out investigations into fur farming to expose the true cost of fur coats, and work closely with groups around the world.

HOW TO GET RID OF THE FUR TRADE IN JUST FIVE YEARS - THE AUSTRIAN WAY

Earlier this year Austrian anti-fur campaigners won a major victory when the last province to have any fur farms decided to ban the trade. Being a federal state, Austria's various provinces can set their own laws.

In the 1970s there were a couple of hundred fur farms, with no Animal Rights movement to campaign against them. A 1990, an Austrian scientific report into fur farming, severely critical of the industry, led to interest from the animal protection movement. At the time mink, chinchilla, foxes and coypu were all bred for their fur.

Inspections of, and demos at, fur farms gained media attention, and footage obtained by activists was used to bring court cases against the farms for breaching animal welfare laws. Some farms were fined and others actually shut down.

Following the court cases, 5 of 9 Austrian provinces outlawed fur farming outright. 3 of the remaining 4 made new regulations so restrictive (such as demanding mink have access to swimming water or outlawing the use of cages) that farms in those provinces had to close down.

By then there were just 2 mink farms left in the remaining province. One was raided by the ALF. Fur trade lobbying watered down new welfare legislation for this province, so the animal protection movement responded with lobbying the government on a massive scale. Direct action pressure mounted with both farms raided twice and damage caused. One farm gave way in January 98. Meanwhile, more scientific studies exposing the cruelty of fur farming were being carried out.

The provincial governor refused to meet campaigners, so they went to him. In February 18 activists visited his office, with 5 locking their necks together. The governor responded to the campaigners and said fur farms would close.

The last Austrian fur farm has now agreed with the government to close down on 30th November and not to appeal against the new law or bring it to EU courts. The deal is: The provincial government will pay the farmer 4.7 million Austrian Schillings (or 235,000 pounds sterling). 2 million when the contract is signed, 2 million in December, and 700,000 when the last sheds and cages have been dismantled and removed. Further, the farmer agrees in the contract never again to breed or keep fur animals in Austria, never to do advertising for fur farming, and not to hand on his knowledge of fur farming. The provincial minister for the environment and animal protection commented: "4.7 million is a lot of money, but considering the balance of private economic interests and animal protection, it is justifiable." Perhaps Labour can learn a thing or two from this.

Chinchilla farms have been given a deadline for closure of 2001, and trapping has been illegal in Austria for a long time. So that just leaves the fur shops. And the heat is on them too! Just about all of the 60 fur shops in Vienna have received smashed windows or glued locks. The only Austrian store with a fur department announced its closure early this year following protests.

The Impact of Mink on British Wildlife

In 1929, the North American mink (Mustela vison) was imported into Britain to be bred for its fur. It was not long before the mink had set up a thriving population in the wild and established its own place in British wildlife. Although mink have probably been free in Britain since the arrival of the first fur farms, it was not until July 1956 that the first breeding wild mink were positively identified in Britain, and now there is believed to be 110,000 wild mink in Britain [1]. Not until 1962, with the introduction of the Mink (Keeping) Order, were mink farms brought under any sort of control to try and prevent the escape of mink, although this was too late to prevent the spread of feral mink. This Order though has been proven on many occasions to be wholly inadequate.

There are many claims that mink are a severe danger to native British wildlife, the argument first being raised with regards to otters and more recently with the water vole. However, there is much evidence to show that mink do not have the severe effect on other wildlife as so often made out. As mink scientist Dr Nigel Dunstone reported: "There can be few animals that have been maligned so frequently and misrepresented so consistently." [3, p3]

Firstly it must be understood that it was the fur farmers who were initially responsible for the release of mink into the wild. Inadequate cages and fencing, as well as the deliberate release by farmers who were hit by lowering profits and bankruptcy, saw many mink escaping into the countryside. As late as the 1980's farmers were reportedly still releasing mink as small-scale mink farmers were bankrupted by slumped sales [2].

Newly escaped mink will probably at first tend to prey on domesticated animals, such as poultry and rabbits. While such killings are often over-hyped by local media craving for a sensational story, it would make sense for anyone living in the vicinity of a mink farm to have adequate fencing or pens to protect their pets or livestock from predation by mink (or any other wild animals). Studies have shown that following escape mink are apt to take easily available food, but once they have adapted to taking natural sources of food they lose this habit. The mink is a member of the Mustelidae family, and is related to the stoat, weasel, pine marten, polecat and feral ferret. Native British wildlife are fully familiar with the hunting methods of mustelids and as such the mink should not pose an unnatural threat to wildlife. Where there is any detrimental effect on wildlife by mink "the important fact is that the effect is local:

nowhere in the UK have mink caused widespread population declines." [3, p191] Most mammal species taken by mink are abundant, and in half of the studies conducted on minks' diet in the UK, the most frequently taken mammals were lagomorphs, particularly rabbits [3, p192 and 13, p560].

The natural behaviour of mink will also ensure that there are no 'plagues'. Mink are solitary animals, strongly defending their own territories in the wild and only seeking other mink in order to mate. Their intolerance of other mink will always ensure a low population density.

Whilst recognising that mink will eat chickens and domesticated rabbits, Ian Linn and Dr Paul Chanin of the University of Exeter, who have both widely studied mink, state [13, p560]: "Yet is this enough to condemn them out of hand? What do they eat when they are not feasting off salmon and chicken? Is it possible that mink have fallen victim to the countryman's need to hate his competitors, which leads otherwise charming and reasonable people to turn livid with rage when contemplating such creatures as the fox, the stoat and the weasel?"

"Certainly there is no evidence of wide-scale ravaging of domestic stock, just to justify a large and expensive control campaign against the mink." [13, p562]

Mink and the Otter

For years the mink was blamed for the demise of the otter. Otter populations crashed in the 1950s and by the 1970s they were present in just 6% of traditional sites in England, although the latest survey shows that this has risen to 23% [4]. Bloodsports enthusiasts, whose summertime 'fun' of otter hunting was banned in 1978 began hunting mink in order to fill the space at the end of the foxhunting season. It has now been recognised that mink were not responsible for the otter's demise, and in fact the otter may even be killing off mink in certain areas. "Experts believe that the otter - whose demise was once, wrongly, attributed to aggression by mink - is outcompeting and could even be killing off its smaller rival." [4]

In addition, evidence existed, and was published in scientific journals [13, 14], in 1978 that mink were not responsible for the falling otter numbers: "As regards competition with otters, there is still no substantial evidence that this occurs, and those who wish to see the return of the otter to its previous abundance must seek another answer. Destruction of mink will not provide the result they desire" [13, p562]. But of course, hunters are not interested in the facts.

"Hunting records between 1950-1970 show that otters were in decline well before mink became firmly and widely established. Destruction of habitat, pollution of waterways and disturbance seem more likely causes than competition with mink." [13, p562]. These records "show unequivocally that mink cannot have been the cause of the otter's decline." [14, p40].

It was not mink that caused the otter's decline but pesticides. The first decline coincided with the introduction of pesticides such as dieldrin and aldrin. Being fish-eating carnivores at the top of the food chain, otters are highly vulnerable to contamination, and a study by the World Wide Fund for Nature found levels of chemicals in otter droppings which were high enough to affect the breeding of otters and even their health [5].

The mink is a generalist predator that exploits a wide variety of species, roughly divided between fish, mammals and birds. It tends to take the most abundant prey, and if this becomes less available will shift attention to another species. These trends tend to limit the mink's impact on local native fauna. In contrast, otters are very specific, almost exclusively eating fish, and larger fish than those taken by mink. Whereas nearly 90% of the otter's prey is fish, this makes up a maximum of 50% of the mink's diet [13, p561].

A recent study [6] in the Outer Hebrides researched any competition between mink and otters where the two cohabited. The study found that mink shifted their diet away from fish and crustacea towards mammals, leaving the otters to follow a fish diet. On smaller islands competition was increased due to shorter numbers of mammals, but both species adjusted to each others company by eating a more generalised diet; it was found that it is the mink, rather than the otter, that is compelled to compromise most.

With otters spreading back to many of their former habitats they may well oust the mink that have taken up their territories. However, in what seems an almost mirror of the situation a few decades ago the otter faces a new threat, this time from new synthetic pyrethroid (SP) sheep dips bought in to replace the old organophosphate dips. The SP dips are 100 times more deadly to aquatic life and are causing serious concern to conservation groups monitoring the otter's habitat [12].

"Pesticides caused the disappearance of the otter, but for many years mink were blamed." BBC Wildlife magazine [4].

Mink and the Water Vole

The latest population decline for which mink are being blamed is that of the water vole. A survey conducted in 1989/90 found that the water vole occupied just one-third of the sites it did at the beginning of the century [7]. A further study in 1995 found an even greater decline in the study area, and conservationists have put the plight of the water vole on an equal footing with that of the panda and tiger [7]. It is feared that at the current rate of decline, by the year 2000 the water vole will remain in only 6% of its original sites [8].

Although numbers of water voles were declining before mink were breeding in the wild in Britain studies have shown what appears to be a major effect of mink predation on their numbers, with increasing numbers of mink relating to decreasing numbers of voles in some studied areas. One study however also found a great deal of habitat destruction, which has also led to the vole's demise, such as disappearance of hedgerows and flooding of land. With less and less of their preferred habitat, water voles find that what remains is often in isolated fragments, preventing threatened populations moving between suitable sites. As one author of this study, David Macdonald, has written, even if the mink is one of the factors increasing the chance of the water vole's extinction it is not the real villain; that, as for most British wildlife, is agricultural intensification [7]. An ecological consultant wrote in the journal of 'The Wildlife Trusts' regarding the correlation between mink increases and water vole decreases: "One might conclude from these observations that mink are directly responsible for the dramatic decline in vole numbers. But matters are rarely so simple." [8]. As with otters, mink and water voles, given sufficiently large areas of undisturbed habitat (such as Tregaron Bog in Mid-Wales), can co-exist [8].

During studies by Dr Paul Chanin of Exeter University into mink prey, referring to the River Frome: "Water voles - often thought of as being at risk from mink - turn up here for the first time, but are never common prey (3.3% of all items)." In this study "water voles are about one-tenth of all mammals taken." [13, p562].

The water vole is listed as one of nine mammals on the UK Biodiversity Action Plan, published in December 1995. This Plan lists four main factors causing loss or decline of the water vole. Predation by mink is listed below loss and fragmentation of habitats and disturbance of riparian [riverbank] habitats, but above that of pollution of watercourses and poisoning by rodenticides [9]. It is hoped that where otters are coming back into rivers the resultant reduction in mink numbers may give the water vole a chance of recolonising [8].

It took many years for mink to be cleared of blame for causing the decline in the otter. Will it take the same amount of time for them to be cleared of blame for the water vole's demise? As Dr Nigel Dunstone pointed out, mink are often the victim of the 'scapegoat effect' "whereby the media demand simplified answers to complicated ecological questions. ... Something or someone must take the blame, and who better than the mink." [3, p189]

"We suspect that American mink and water voles could co-exist if they were freed from a narrow swathe of bankside vegetation. ... the way to save the water vole, and much else besides, is not to pursue the arguably hopeless task of widescale eradication of mink, but to focus on the cheaper and more practicable goal of nurturing riverside habitats. ... in such lowland catchment areas typified by the Thames valley, my hunch is that the mink's impact on voles could occur only because the mink arrived in the wake of human destruction of waterside habitats. And the mink's spread was facilitated by human destruction of native predators." Prof. David Macdonald [7]

Mink and Other Wildlife

As for the mink's effect on other wildlife, most claims appear to come from bloodsports enthusiasts who claim mink prey on game birds and fishing stocks. Since both these are reared for killing for 'fun' they are maintained at artificially high levels and it is ironic that people should complain that mink are killing game birds and fish when that is the reason for those critics rearing them in the first place!

Even then, studies conducted over long periods have shown that poultry and game birds generally make up less than 1% of the minks diet (the highest recorded was 5.4%) [3, p193].

As for fish stocks, Dunstone found "Little supportive evidence has been found for any deleterious effect on fish stocks and angling interests" and that "Fish stocks have a remarkable ability to respond to depletion because of their great fecundity [fertility]." [3, p190]. Mink tend to take whatever fish is available, but with a marked preference for eels. "On the whole, therefore, the mink's effect on fish faunas could be regarded as mainly beneficial." [13, p561]

The same people have claimed that mink have reduced the density of moorhens, coots and ducks [11], a claim denied by Prof. David Macdonald: "... contrary to widespread opinion, nobody has ever found evidence that mink predation limits numbers of these birds." [7]. According to Linn and Chanin of Exeter University: "We have frequently been told that when mink colonise an area the moorhens or coots disappear. So far, our attempts to find places where this has been documented have met with failure. As one of our study areas had thriving populations of both moorhens and coots, we can be certain that it is not necessarily so." [14, p39].

"Research results indicate that the mink has generally not had a serious effect on our wildlife although there remains some concern about its possible effect on some colonies of ground-nesting birds." Sir Hector Munro MP (13)

"Without dependence on a particular prey type, the mink can minimise its direct competition with resident predators. Thus it has spread throughout Europe and the subarctic with few apparent barriers and, despite its reputation, with remarkably little impact on the ecology of the indigenous fauna." Dr Nigel Dunstone (4, p2)

FUR WARS

...the Campaign Against Philip Hockley

In the 1980s the animal rights movement decimated the fur trade. All across Britain shops that sold fur shut down due to a combination of local group campaigning and direct action. Department stores with fur departments were targeted by the ALF with incendiary devices and by 1990 the last of these - Harrods - had closed their salon.

Propaganda campaigns, such as the famous David Bailey commercial for Lynx, played their part in turning public opinion against wearing dead animals, and by the beginning of the decade the mood was so antagonistic that a Daily Express journalist even dressed in a full length mink coat and walked through central London to gauge peoples' response. Not surprisingly she encountered a great deal of hostility, including a young woman who shouted: "How would you like to be skinned and worn on someone else's back. Why don't you just * off. I think you're ugly anyway."

The fur trade it seemed was finished in Britain. But was it? What really happened was that it batted down the hatches and retreated to safety. Whilst it appeared that as fur shops closed all over the country the trade was dying, in reality London remained its stronghold: it was and still is one of the main centres of the international fur industry. By 1992 the media had started reporting that fur was making a comeback. Designers were using it on the continent again, fur trim was becoming more commonly worn, and worst of all, Selfridges announced they were reopening their fur department. It was this decision that led to the formation of the London Anti-Fur Campaign, which held demonstrations outside Selfridges that quickly forced them to change their mind. In spring 1993 a march through central London attracted about 800 people, and the following year the Fur Free London Campaign was launched with the intention of picketing the main shops in central London until they either closed down or stopped selling real fur. This tactic had worked well elsewhere, with the result that there was barely a single fur shop left in the whole country apart from London. But could it work in the capital, where the fur trade was strongest and there was a great deal of passing trade mainly in the form of tourists?

In the autumn of 1994 the Fur Free London Campaign, who had just amalgamated with the newly formed London Animal Action, started daily pickets of Noble Furs in Regent Street. Within four months the shop had closed down and moved its office around the corner to a side street, but was not open to the public. Shortly afterwards Jindo Furs in Knightsbridge closed following a short, sustained campaign, and Montana Furs stopped selling real fur. Within eight months real success had been achieved, but this was to prove something of a false dawn, as events of the next three years were to show.

In June 1995, demonstrations began outside Philip Hockley's in Conduit Street, W1. Located in the heart of wealthy Mayfair, this is the most prestigious fur shop left in London, the only one to open regularly on a Saturday. The demos took the usual form of people standing outside and leafleting with placards and banners every Saturday and sometimes on weekdays too. These continued through the summer until suddenly a curious event occurred, the first of many that were to happen in a campaign that has dragged on for over three years. Hockley's hired security to hold a pro-fur 'counter-demonstration'. Two hefty blokes who looked like night-club bouncers stood outside and pretended to protest in favour of the right to sell fur, and the police then said the antis had to stand on the other side of the road to prevent a breach of the peace. This was the first of many decisions the police took in favour of the shop and against the campaigners.

As the police had stated whoever turns up first could remain, each side began arriving earlier and earlier to secure the spot. Eventually three protesters got there at 6.30am one Saturday morning, only to be told by the police who arrived later that they had to move across the road or be arrested for obstructing the footpath. The three did not want to be arrested so moved and later on Inspector White from West End Central police station, who was in charge of policing, told a campaigner he was "punishing" them because of an earlier spontaneous demo in which about 50 people turned up outside the shop following an appeal hearing for animal rights prisoner Keith Mann.

Thus the pattern was established for the police to continually try to neutralise the effectiveness of the demos. Barriers were put up which people were supposed to stand behind and although occasionally one or two people were allowed to leaflet near Hockley's on the same side of the street, this happened less and less as the police attitude hardened. To counter this, London Animal Action decided to call for a national day of action against the London fur trade. On March 13th, 1996 over 200 activists from across the country descended on central London. Groups roamed around central London causing mayhem, but the main highlight was when about 100 people paid a home visit to the manager, Michael Hockley, at his house in fashionable St John's Wood. Michael and his wife were walking down the garden path when a police van screeched to a halt outside and an officer in riot gear jumped out shouting: "Get inside quick, they're coming!" Eventually, about a dozen riot vans, dog handlers, Range Rovers and even a low-flying helicopter were used and after half an hour the angry crowd of protesters were pushed down the road by the police line. The police behaviour was extremely violent, with several people being assaulted and arrested - though no one was charged.

Two days later a letter was hand delivered to London Animal Action's office by Michael Hockley's solicitors, informing us he had: "No alternative but to resign his position as manager" and give up: "Any connections and interests whatsoever in and with the fur industry." Michael Hockley, however, did not own the shop. Though started by his grandfather in the 1920s, it was taken over by the Polar Group, a large fur manufacturer / broker / exporter in 1987. Philip Hockley Ltd was now a 'dormant company' that published no accounts, and Hockley himself, while on paper still a director, had no real financial stake in or control over the business.

The demos continued every Saturday but in mid-1996 the barriers were moved about 20 feet along the street. This prevented people from being able to see into the shop, although there were always screens across the inside of the shop anyway. At about this time the manager who had replaced Michael Hockley received a home visit and resigned immediately as well. During the period 1996-97, it became perfectly obvious whose side the police were on. Protesters were constantly harassed about where to stand or what they could shout. The police banned certain words. For example it was forbidden to shout directly at a customer - "You animal murderer!", but "Fur trade, murder trade!" was okay. Moreover the police were cosying up to the shop - Inspector White would regularly spend hours inside. Rumours emerged of some sort of Masonic conspiracy but nothing was ever confirmed. All this time a small but dedicated band of people kept the demos going.

In May 1997 there were protests outside the homes of two directors of Polar Furs. These were peaceful, with people simply leafleting outside and the police who turned up made no effort to arrest anyone. But two months later one of the directors, Frank Victor Silverton, took out an injunction against certain named groups (including LAA), individuals and "anyone who considers themselves an animal rights activist". The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 was supposed to protect women from stalkers but instead has been repeatedly used against animal rights activists. An exclusion zone was placed around the homes of the directors and the shop. Anyone entering would be breaching the injunction and liable to be sued, but this was not a criminal offence.

As soon as the injunction was implemented the police made the decision to move the barriers so the demo would be outside the exclusion zone. Now it was over 100 feet from the shop! In effect the police were acting as agents of Philip Hockley; the injunction was not a criminal matter but they were treating it as though it was. Anyone venturing near the shop was told they were breaking the injunction and would be arrested for obstruction or breach of the peace. This situation persisted until three protesters decided to test the legality of the police actions. They received legal advice that the best way of doing this was to offer themselves up for arrest and take the matter to court. The three stood on the edge of the kerb and peacefully leafleted but were arrested within minutes and charged with obstructing the highway. In court on March 30th, 1998 all three were acquitted when a video taken by a fellow protester clearly showed no obstruction had taken place.

The following Saturday the same three returned and were again arrested, but this time for behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace. Breach of the peace is an ancient common law offence that is not codified in a statute. It is a vague catch-all law used for arrest when no other offences are available. Behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace is even vaguer; it means no breach of the peace has occurred but the presence of those arrested may lead to one. The three arrested were released from police custody after the shop had closed. Conveniently for the police this is a non-chargeable offence, so it is very difficult for it to be tested in court.

We then decided to test the police's determination to make arrests. On May 9th, ten people were arrested for demonstrating outside the shop. They walked up either singularly or in pairs and as soon as they were arrested someone else took their place. After the first few arrests the police were obviously stretched and unable to cope with the numbers: two people were allowed to leaflet for nearly an hour. All arrests were for behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace and people were let go after the shop closed. Another day of mass arrests occurred on May 30th. This time nine were nicked with the same result. It seemed there were no lengths to which the police would not go in order to clear protesters from around the shop.

In order to get a better idea of the police motives and to see whether any common ground existed we requested a meeting with the officers responsible for the demos. After a number of delays this finally took place on June 9th. Present were Chief Inspector Barker, now in charge, and Inspector White. It soon became crystal clear that they were not willing to make any compromises. The only demos permissible were those they defined as 'controlled', which meant people standing behind barriers. Otherwise, they said, a breach of the peace may occur. Their solicitors had advised them that to place barriers within the exclusion zone covered by the injunction may be interpreted as them encouraging us to break it, so the barriers have to be outside and hence very far from the shop.

So was what the police were saying legally correct? According to our lawyers definitely not. Firstly, in order to arrest someone they must have reasonable grounds to believe a breach of the peace is likely. Our demonstrations are always peaceful. Secondly the police should not be trying to interpret the injunction. It is a civil matter and so does not have anything to do with them. Instead, the lengths they are prepared to go can be judged from the case of a woman who was arrested for obstruction for leafleting outside the shop in May, despite being one of those who was acquitted on March 30th. She was kept in custody overnight and taken to court where the case was adjourned and she was granted bail on the condition she didn't enter Conduit Street. A few days later she went to the shop again, so breaking her bail condition, was arrested and held overnight, taken to court the next day and given even stricter conditions. When a few weeks later she broke those she was again arrested and taken to court, where the magistrates remanded her in custody for a whole week while they decided what to do with her. On returning to court her bail conditions were made even harsher. So in effect a person was locked up for a week for no more than leafleting.

Nearly three and a half years on we are back to square one. If anyone needed reminding of the lengths to which the authorities are prepared to go to stifle legitimate protest they should look at the case of Hockley's. The fur trade is deeply unpopular - every opinion poll shows around 80 per cent of the public are opposed to it - yet instead of allowing those people who represent the will of the majority to peacefully demonstrate, the police instead persecute, arrest and lock them up.

The demonstrations against Philip Hockley Ltd will continue each Saturday. The address is:

More on London Animal Action...

LAA is continuing to concentrate on the fur trade with regular demos against the Philip Hockley and Calman Links fur shops. We are also helping to organise the National Week of Action against the Fur Trade from 14-21 November.

Our supporters were involved in the successful campaign to stop a chicken slaughterhouse opening in south London and we have hired coaches to take people to the Hillgrove demos. We publish a monthly newsletter, London Animal Rights News, packed with news and information on what's going on in London and elsewhere, and hold meetings on the second Tuesday of every month at:

1a Community Centre, 1a Rosebery
Avenue, London EC1, at 7.30pm
Tube: Chancery Lane

It costs £5 to join the group (unwaged £3), for which you will receive LARN every month. Please make cheques payable to: 'LAA'.

The saga had not finished though. Instead, history was about to repeat itself. One Saturday in August protesters turned up to find the security guards standing outside the shop. We were told to move across the road again otherwise a breach of the peace might occur. So we started turning up earlier and earlier. On one occasion four people arrived at 6am having come straight from a night-club! No police or security was present, but an Inspector who turned up later threatened to arrest them unless they moved, yet backed down when they refused. Finally on October 3rd, when protesters again arrived first, the police told them to move across the road. Two people were arrested for behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace and released when the shop had closed. The latest development is - barriers are back! They have been placed across the road from the shop

Animal Rights - Political and Social Change in Britain since 1800

by Hilda Kean

The issue of animal rights has never been so topical. As concern with our environment intensifies, and advances in science - genetic engineering, the cloning of species, the development of new drugs and cosmetics - all focus on the way that we treat animals and on what that says about our own humanity.

As vegetarianism and veganism become ever more popular, and both animal experimentation and the wearing of furs attract the threat of physical attack, it is time to trace the background to contemporary debates, and to situate them in a broader historical context.

Hilda Kean looks at the political, cultural and social history of animal rights activism from 1800 to the present - at the way in which simple tales of animal heroism captured the public imagination and engendered sympathy for animals and outrage at their exploitation. She shows how such sentiments fired the anti-vivisection campaign, the spread of vegetarianism, the arguments over furs, fashion and foxhunting, and informed public debate over the uses and abuses of animals in war and peace. She shows how concern with animal rights was closely allied with campaigns for social and political reform - by anti-vaccinationists, suffragettes, socialists and pacifists.

Hilda Kean is tutor in History at Ruskin College, Oxford. She has researched and published on feminism, politics, local government and education.

Printed in hardback, the book contains 272 pages with 40 illustrations. The normal price is £19.95 but is available to readers of Arkangel magazine for a discounted price of £16 (post-free UK only).

The Cement Cross - by Edward Edwards

...a novel about animal abuse

Only when Animal Liberationists have created that demand in the System, and caused it to acknowledge that animals have rights and that freedom stems from it, will they have succeeded in their campaign to end the terrorism of the animal world. That beginning, when fear is the first priority of the System to cause it to change, will signal the end of slavery and restore the rights of animals throughout the world.

Published by T Ruth in 1990, The Cement Cross is an unusual book and Edward Edwards has a unique style of writing.

Cement Cross is available price £5 from:

Animal Century - by Mark Gold

... a celebration of changing attitudes to animals

The illustrated story of a century of animal liberation and welfare, told in the voices of many of the century's most prominent campaigners, and against the backdrop of accelerating social and political change. This is a social history that has been largely unwritten - until now. From the 'brown dog' who inspired riots on the streets of London, to the Greenpeace campaign to 'Save the Whales'. From public praise for George V's slaughter of 21 Indian tigers, to fierce criticism of Prince Charles for his support for hunting. From the birth of the conservation and wildlife protection movements, to the passionate campaign to stop the live export of animals. Animal Century offers a fascinating insight into the events which changed our attitudes, and the people who made it all happen.

The book includes interviews with key figures such as Ronnie Lee, Jane Goodall, Sarah Kite, Maneka Gandhi, Dave Wetton and Virginia McKenna.

Animal Century is published by Jon Carpenter and is available for £12.99 (p&p free - add £1 overseas) from:

Babylon Farm - by Geoff Francis

...the evils of factory farming

Babylon Farm is as disturbing as it is compulsive reading. It is beautifully written, vivid and often heart-rending. The book's themes haunt the imagination and churn the emotions. For anyone who cares about the present and wants a better future should read it. Geoff's book clearly and deliberately exposes the appalling pain and degradation that factory farming inflicts on the lives of billions of animals. No one who reads Babylon Farm can avoid the shame that humanity must bear for the dreadful behaviour of our species towards those who should be our companions. But shame is not enough - the triumph of Geoff's book is that it will inspire the reader to work to free farm animals from what must all too often be a living hell.

Babylon Farm - a novel by Geoff Francis is published by Animus Books and is available for £4.50 from:

Viva! - Four and Feisty

Tony Wardle, a Viva! trustee, reviews the charity's work since being launched four years ago

When Viva! was launched on October 26, 1994, saving animals was its primary concern. It still is - nothing has changed!

Three people working from a garage extension in the middle of rural Cheshire were unlikely to change the world and to effectively save animals, good intentions weren't enough. Viva! had to be taken seriously and the key to that was professionalism - excellent campaigners, writers, designers, research and press relations. No one was paid for the first two years so it was literally a labour of conviction for everyone.

The first campaign had to hit with real impact and it did. Convert-a-Parent was calculatedly controversial. A range of guides was produced for teenagers on all the vegetarian issues, each one authored by an expert or celebrity. They were designed to answer every doubt that parents might have about their children going vegetarian. With youth contacts all over the country acting as press spokespeople, the campaign was localised and produced over 150 newspaper reports as well as national radio and television. When the Daily Express likened our young activists to the Hitler youth, we knew Viva! was on its way.

Another key element in success was to establish new local groups and to forge good, working relationships with existing groups. These, in a sense, are the troops who put into action the battle plans. Without them we knew that Viva! could not succeed.

The first test of this relationship came with the launch of the film Babe. Viva! responded immediately and campaign materials were produced within a week, including the memorable leaflet 'Who loves ya Babe', which revealed the true conditions in which pigs are kept. Local groups, many dressed in pig costumes, leafleted outside cinemas all over the UK. Over 100 picture stories resulted, as well as numerous radio and TV programmes. Millions of people were forced to confront the essential hypocrisy between their diet and their attitude to Babe the film star. Following the campaign, pork sales slumped by ten per cent and have continued in free fall ever since.

As live export demonstrations reached a peak at Shoreham, Brightlingsea and Luton, Viva! decided to get young people involved with The Crate campaign. Rallies and marches for children and teenagers were organised in 11 cities. Equipped with their banners, whistles and purple balloons, children who had previously had to opportunity to show their disgust at the cruelty, took their message proudly to the heart of Britain. Everywhere they went the media followed with almost uniquely supportive reports.

The Crate Escape children's competition to design a poster or banner against live exports produced over a thousand entries. Local newspapers all over the country carried picture stories and the simple messages of outrage portrayed on some extraordinarily imaginative banners.

impact on most young people can be dramatic as for the first time they see the reality of meat production.

"It is the most rewarding and important work you can possibly undertake", is a common response from Viva!'s schools speakers. And their numbers are increasing all the time. With the production of the schools' video Food for Life, their impact has been even greater. As well as being used to support speakers, over 1,500 secondary schools have requested the video to use as part of the school curriculum.

With the launch of Juliet Gellatley's book, The Silent Ark, there was sense of having reached a watershed. Its serialisation in The Times and reviews in other national media, including Radio One, were uniformly uncritical. The first book to draw together all the vegetarian and vegan issues, it was starkly disturbing. The scale of the brutality inherent in livestock production, its pernicious destruction of the environment, its impoverishment of the world's poorest people and its negative impact on human health provided an unarguable case for a vegan world. The flood of letters from those who read it - meat eaters becoming vegetarian, vegetarians becoming vegan - showed how powerful and necessary it was, and still is. It was quickly followed by the Livewire Guide to Going, Being and Staying Veggie, a similarly comprehensive book aimed at teenagers.

Viva!'s move to Brighton was vital so that growth could continue. Shortly after arriving in the town, a campaign against exotic meats, which had been launched 18 months earlier, came to fruition. Tesco faxed to say they were dropping the trade in ostrich, kangaroo and other wild meats. Specially produced campaign materials and a superbly successful letter writing campaign by local Viva! supporters had produced hundreds of stories in newspapers all over the UK, many with splash coverage and evocative pictures. The culmination was a double page spread on kangaroo killing in the News of the World. Within days of Tesco pulling out, Somerfield and Booker cash and carry followed suit.

Sainsbury's were left as the sole remaining national supplier of exotic meats and a nationwide day of action against them saw 130 local groups demonstrating outside stores everywhere. News coverage was extraordinary successful but instead of throwing in the towel like Tesco, Sainsbury's appear to be trying to save face by quietly removing exotic meats from their shelves. Whichever way you view it, it's another victory for the animals.

Viva!'s latest campaign is an expose of the dismal attempt by government and the MLC to promote pig meat by claiming that British pigs have the highest welfare standards in the world. By using undercover researchers, equipped with hidden cameras, we have been able to expose this claim as the lie it is. Our shocking footage filmed at three pig units was shown on BBC2's Private Investigations. But we are not finished with the pig industry yet. We have now covertly filmed 12 units and plan to visit many more in order to produce evidence that cannot be denied. When ready, we will present it in such a way that it will get the widest possible coverage. And there will be other covert exposes of the appalling conditions which farm animals have to endure during their lives and deaths.

Viva! now has the support, the skilled and dedicated staff and local networks to make a real and continuing impact in defence of animals. It was the need to fight to save animals that led to the birth of Viva! Nothing has diminished that aim, in fact it is stronger than ever. Watch this space!

ALF (SUPPORTERS GROUP) : UPDATE

The month of October saw a lot of people in court for Hillgrove demonstrations earlier in the year. Many of the charges were section 2 and 4 of the Public Order Act, as well as some for Assault, Obstruction and Breach of the Peace.

The Hillgrove campaign is a very strong campaign, attracting new people all the time as well as seasoned campaigners and activists. The authorities have reacted to the strength of feeling evoked at the demonstrations with aggressive surveillance and persecution of a large number of people, many of them new to the movement. Rather than get rid of the root cause of the problem - Hillgrove Farm - they are trying to get rid of the campaign by scaring people off, imposing strict bail conditions and handing out over-the-top punishment. The coming months will see more people go to prison for the Hillgrove cats.

The ALF (Supporters Group) will be helping these prisoners, as with any other person convicted of furthering the cause of Animal Liberation. Anyone who has not yet joined the Supporters Group are urged to do so, to ensure that there are enough funds to continue this support and to receive the addresses of the prisoners. A friendly letter is a vital link with the outside world and a great morale boost. It is especially important that newcomers get support, so that when they get out they return to our movement and continue to work towards Animal Liberation. You don't have to know the person. All that is required is a short letter telling them about your feelings, what's been happening and any news which you think may be of interest. Remember though, all letters are checked by prison officers before they reach the prisoner!

With over 20 people charged with Section 2 it is possible that the SG will be struggling to financially support everyone if the sentences are very long. Your help will mean that the prisoners will get the help they need. If you are ever in the position of other Animal Liberation prisoners, then the ALFSG will be there to help!

Should you decide to join the ALF Supporters Group, please send £2 per month or £24 per year. Alternately, you could send for a standing order form so that you can pay by direct debit.

UNCAGED: RADICAL SOLUTIONS

by Alistair Currie, Campaign Co-ordinator

As the youngest professional anti-vivisection organisation in the UK, Uncaged Campaigns represent, we believe, the cutting edge of the movement against animal experiments. While the long-established giants of the movement do an excellent job in their way, their very size and seniority can also incline them to caution. Uncaged recognises the need for a range of different campaigning approaches, but we also believe that the presence of an uncompromisingly radical but professional organisation is vital to the progress of our cause.

Uncaged Campaigns oppose vivisection on scientific and ethical grounds, and adhere to vegan, feminist and green philosophies in all that we do. We believe that only profound changes in our attitude as a society to health, medicine and the power of vested interests can lead to lasting change on this issue, and that animal experimentation cannot be confronted in isolation from these influences. We place a heavy emphasis, therefore, on grassroots campaigning, taking our message directly to the British people and challenging public preconceptions directly. Our emphasis as an organisation is on 'medical' experimentation, as we consider it vital to confront vivisection - and the assumptions that surround it - where it draws the greatest public support, and we draw extensively on original scientific literature to support our arguments. We recognise, however, that commercial interests figure largely in the promotion of vivisection, and we also accept the responsibility of confronting those who profit from animal experimentation directly.

Consequently, our two specific campaigns focus on xenotransplantation (the transplantation of organs or tissues from animals to humans) and Procter & Gamble, the multinational producer of household products and toiletries, who continue to test on animals even where there is no legal requirement to do so.

Xenotransplantation is one of the most disturbing developments in animal experimentation ever to emerge. Not only is the use of animals as mere sources of organs for human beings morally unacceptable, but the potential risks to human health posed by this experimental procedure (through the possible transfer of infectious viruses from donor animal to the human population) are frightening to contemplate. Uncaged believes that a line must be drawn preventing this terrible and unprecedented form of animal exploitation ever becoming established. We have been the driving force behind a network of organisations called Xenotransplantation Concern (XtC) to coordinate opposition to this practice. Over the past year Uncaged's representative on XtC has met with the Government and with leading xeno researchers Imutran to press the case against xenotransplantation, and although neither meeting (predictably) changed any minds or policies, both produced valuable information for the campaign on the ground. XtC has generated considerable media interest including from The Guardian and BBC TV News and has established itself as the 'official' opposition to xenotransplantation.

Procter & Gamble sell around $40 billion worth of goods every year, producing such top name brands as Fairy Liquid and Daz. They also continue to test their products on animals. Uncaged believe their very size renders them a key target for a sustained campaign against this practice, and our Global Boycott of Procter & Gamble has attracted well over 100,000 signatories and cost P&G an estimated £5 million. The public are clearly behind this campaign, and a combination of attention-grabbing publicity (such as our Sunny Despair campaign against P&G's new, heavily promoted juice 'n' chemical cocktail for kids) and co-operation with animal rights groups at local level has kept it in the public eye - and earned it a place in Ethical Consumer magazine's Top Five consumer boycotts.

Our plans for the future are still more ambitious. On 10th December this year the UN celebrates fifty years of the Declaration of Human Rights. We will be marking that anniversary by launching a campaign to have a UN Declaration of Animal Rights by 10th December 2048. We believe that we can end fifty thousand years of exploitation in fifty years of campaigning. Who cares wins.

Uncaged will campaign in any way that advances our cause, from contacts with MPs and the Government, to talking to shoppers in town centres, to holding a banner at demonstrations. Having recently obtained our millionth individual signature on our national petition against animal experiments we have the self-confidence of an organisation that knows its message is getting through. We will moderate neither our commitment nor our message. The challenge facing all opponents of animal experimentation is enormous but we will not give up.

Radical problems demand radical solutions.

The Red Squirrel - Driven by Man to Near Extinction

The Grey Squirrel - Falsely Accused and made to pay for Man's Wrongdoings

by Linda Chan

Squirrel myths...

The myth that surrounds the red and grey squirrels suggests that the greys killed off the reds, making them natural enemies.

Squirrel facts...

Red squirrels reached peak numbers at the end of the last century. Masses of fast growing conifers were planted at the beginning of the 19th century, in which squirrels survive best.

People classed red squirrels as 'pests' then - just as they do grey squirrels today! Countless numbers of reds were killed, and their coniferous habitats destroyed, causing their drastic decline.

The grey squirrel, though first introduced at the end of the last century from America, was not fully established until after the red squirrel declined at the start of this century.

Epidemic diseases - Coccidiosis and Parapox Virus also affected the squirrels. Grey squirrel numbers suffered too, due to Coccidiosis, but Parapox Virus did not seem to affect them, as it did the reds. It is thought that Parapox Virus is stress related. The reds would most certainly have suffered stress through people chopping down their coniferous homes and depleting their food supply!

The grey squirrels, much better at surviving in the remaining broad-leaved woods, having done so for millions of years, naturally replaced the reds. They are much better suited to food from deciduous areas and have a more varied diet. They do not rely on pinecones like the reds, which have trouble digesting certain deciduous tree seeds such as acorns.

Grey and red squirrels can live together quite happily in a wood, and even share drays (nests). One can deduce from these facts that grey squirrels are not the enemies of the red squirrel. The red squirrels' enemy is man, who quite happily killed them in cold blood when they were high in numbers and is now hypocritically pretending to try to help them by using their demise as an excuse to kill greys.

It is also said that greys 'damage' trees and should be controlled for this purpose as well, yet the same was said of the reds in the past! Squirrels strip tree bark to eat the sap, especially when food is scarce, ie. the summer months. It can also keep their incisors worn down. This so-called tree 'damage' is squirrel survival. Compare it to destruction by humans to trees (squirrels' habitats!) If grey squirrels were to disappear it would not bring back the red squirrels' habitats, and if red squirrels did make a comeback and their numbers greatly increased they would most certainly be killed for 'damaging' trees!

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, responsible for species conservation, say: "It is recognised that grey squirrels cause severe damage to trees by eating the bark during spring and summer," and, "The Government is aware that many of the public would view the control of grey squirrels somewhat strange as many people have only seen greys and believe them to be a British species. It is recognised that the culling of the grey squirrel population would be seen as brutal. However the government's primary concern is to ensure the survival of Britain's native bio-diversity." In other words, it is acceptable to brutally kill grey squirrels (they are poisoned with warfarin, chased and shot blood-sport style, trapped and gassed) because they are, after all, not British!

It would be much appreciated if your views and protest letters on this could be sent to:

Not the Gandalf Trial

by Paul Rogers

As a defendant, I would like to comment on Noel Molland's article on the Gandalf (Green Anarchist and ALF) trial. He puts great effort into explaining how Robin Webb came to be in the dock - and out of it! - but very little into explaining how he came to be there as opposed to, for example, Barry Horne or a political rival of Robin's. A well known militant would have been more prejudicial in the eyes of the jury and a political rival more disruptive of defence efforts. Why the editors of Green Anarchist, who are - if I do say so myself - quite peripheral to the animal liberation movement?

To understand this, we must look at what didn't happen in court.

Although Noel is good enough to concede that my barrister Ken McDonald quit on me (some other accounts garble this), he doesn't really explain why. I was insistent an MI5 / Searchlight agent provocateur, who had infiltrated GA in the early 1990's, Tim Hepple (now 'Matthews'), be called as a witness and McDonald was refusing my instruction. McDonald thoroughly botched the PII phase when questions about this and like individuals should have been raised, and others in the defence team avoided bringing documents in the unused evidence that included a police action. With Hepple's address and photo appended to my attention. I'm mentioning all this: 1) to warn people off hiring McDonald if they ever come to court but, much more importantly: 2) to demonstrate a lot more was going on during the last Gandalf trial than ever came to public notice.

Hepple was sent into GA to provoke political violence. He constantly urged it, gave us the addresses of targets and offered us guns and communications equipment. Most relevant to the Gandalf prosecution, he wrote an ecotage manual, the Eco-defenders' Handbook, and made a great fuss in the movement media about ecotage action he'd taken in the name of the Earth Liberation Front (ELF). Hepple wasn't the only one sent into the movement - the case of Stuart McCulloch infiltrating Belfast Animal Rights springs to mind and he, too, opened an ELF box at Monomarks House.

Hepple was exposed in early 1993 and McCulloch late the next year. Makes you wonder how many more there were, doesn't it? One thing that McDonald did get out of MI5 during the PII phase was the claim that they stopped classifying Greens as 'threats to national security' after 1995 - ie. well after the current documented provocateurs infiltrated the scene. It was claimed that Special Branch took over monitoring greenies thereafter - though MI5 defector David Shayler insisted in his August 1997 Newsnight interview that 'ecowarriors' were still MI5's prime target. 1993 was the year of Twyford Down - and the year the Animal Rights National Index (ARNI) extended their brief to militant Greens ('ecowarriors'). From then on, there was a steady trickle of propaganda stories about 'ecoterrorists' through mainstream media mouthpieces that actually acknowledged Special Branch (ie. ARNI) as their principal source. 'Ecoterrorist' is a term the British security forces imported from the FBI when Earth First! started up in the UK around 1991.

After the propaganda came the prosecution. We'd argued GA was involved because it gave the security forces to opportunity to showcase 'ecoterrorism'. That's not what the whole trial was about, but it was why GA's were in the dock as opposed to any of the 'usual suspects'. Hepple was never mentioned in court - despite heroic attempts by some of the defendants - but articles on anti-fascism Hepple caused to be written were used against those on trial. Something missing from Noel's account is that originally the Gandalf trial would have been about a 'conspiracy to cause GBH' to do with reporting on the Justice Department. When the trial ended, it was as if the original charge had been bought, rather than the more flexible 'conspiracy to incite'. The Gandalf Three found themselves accused of being terrorists just for writing, and hostile press accounts also labelled them 'Green terrorists' and emphasised they 'urged people to sent bombs through the post', a breach of 19th century Explosives Acts that would have merited rather more than 3 years inside. (They were originally passed to crush the Fenians!) The security forces couldn't make more of the trial because the judge bungled it so badly that it became a civil liberties issue and they had to quieten down media attention instead with a lot of BS about subjudice.

ARNI's angle is simple and unproblematic - a wider shooting gallery and a bigger blunderbuss, the conspiracy / incitement laws. What MI5 hoped to get out of the trial was more complex. During her 1994 Dimpleby lecture, MI5 director Stella Rimington claimed instances of subversion were down but those of domestic terrorism were up. What was actually going on was the counter-subversion section F2 had done enough 'dirty tricks' in the Thatcher years - framing Arthur Scargill, infiltrating CND, etc - that it expected to be hammered when Labour took power. So it was, come May 1997. All MI5 are doing is reclassifying

'subversion' (eg. writing) as 'domestic terrorism' and the Gandalf trial was supposed to be pivotal in effecting this, a paradigm case of how writing can be 'terrorism' (ie. bombs) in the public's mind. I think so far they've failed, mainly because the judge's blatant bias failed to provide a just foundation on which this edifice could be built, but we'll see what happens at the Gandalf II trial.

There are a number of conclusions we can draw from this:

■ That Operation Washington was a lot bigger than Hampshire Constabulary, ARNI's front and that the authorities want to broaden repression way beyond the animal liberation movement. This is useful in terms of us making alliances beyond the movement too.

■ That it's not just 'all about Robin Webb' and Des Thomas's personal crusade against him. Discrediting whoever's running Operation Washington's fine - no copper wants to take on a career liability - but they can always get another 'all-licensed fool' where that one came from; and

■ That to some extent the 'ecoterrorist threat' has been manufactured by MI5 to keep themselves in work post-Cold War and so they richly deserve to be cut to ribbons by the Treasury if they try to use this hype to make appropriations. They have foolishly handed us a powerful weapon to strike back with if we can push it hard enough in the public domain.

AMAZONS

A Response to the Men in Black

by Anon.

Whilst the Men in Black (Arkangel 19) bask in their glory behind masks of cotton, women have the opportunity to use the sexist system as their camouflage. We can blend in and conform to the image they expect of us, be it a clueless airhead or a middle age frump in a tweed suit. We can create a mask that will make them see what ever we want them to see; all we need is what life has taught us and the sexist stereotypes within their heads. They will not ask you to remove your mask. They will not look within.

Their ears are not tuned in to the beating of our inner drums; they do not hear our war cries. They are ignorant to our strength and power, their ignorance is our bliss. Their ignorance is the tool that sits best in our hand. Wear your masks well. Be sure that when needed your legs can deceive an admirer with a powerful kick. Treat your body well, it's the one thing they can't take from you. Fill your head with knowledge and your body with strength. Turn your determination into inspiration. Train your body and mind; empower yourself. Put down your pint and pick up the tools of liberation. Get away with it...

NEWS FROM JAPAN

by Anne Ashley

A Japanese A/R friend stayed with me at the end of August and gave me the following details about animal activities in Japan:

■ Free Animals Network (FAN) say that about 20 people did continuous demos between March to September 1997 who were opposed to the captive Orca whales in Wakayama.

■ During Winter / Spring 1998, anti-fur demos took place at Tokyo's huge Shinjuka station. There was also a demo against the ivory trade at Tokyo station.

■ 'All Life In a Viable Environment' (ALIVE) campaigned against the capture and use of wild monkeys in laboratories which is a big issue in Japan. ALIVE also works closely with Zoo Check. All over Japan there is a network of 30 organisations and groups working to improve government laws for the protection of wild birds and animals.

■ A large cruelty-free exhibition took place in Tokyo Park, including a stall full of vegan food.

FUTURE ACTIVITIES

As the ivory trade will re-start in January 1999, FAN are planning actions against it this Autumn as well as anti-fur activities.

ALIVE will continue to campaign against factory farming and for vegetarianism.

ALF-type activities in Japan this year have included the rescue of rabbits and chickens from medical schools. All are now happy in new homes!

HOW WE LOST OUR SOULS WHEN WE ENSLAVED ANIMALS

Author / Lecturer Jim Mason has written a powerful new book exploring human supremacy as a dominant force on this planet. Jim puts forth a new theory of oppression, and he makes an important plea for a total rethinking of our relationship to animals and the living world.

Animals have informed and empowered the human mind throughout our evolution. Animals were (and are) the main other beings in the world around us. Animals are the lively, noisy, moving parts to the living world. They are familiar, yet different; they puzzle us and make us wonder about the living world. They have impressed the human mind like nothing else ever has.

Animals are embedded in the human mind. They figure in the first paintings, in folktales, in children's stories, toys and games, in Rohrshach tests, in our language, and in creation stories of peoples and cultures the world over. From our wondering about animals, we learned to think and to speak.

Animals were regarded as the most important spirits and powers in the world. Animals were thought to embody some of the more powerful mysteries in nature. As early humans formed a worldview, animals were the most important elements. Then as now, views and attitudes about animals shaped views and attitudes about nature in general.

When we use animals symbolically, as in art and poetry, we are using animals as representatives of the natural world. It has been so for millennia. When the temple friezes and cylinder seals of ancient civilisations depicted their soldier-warrior hero-kings slaughtering lions, they were symbolically conquering the earth, because the lion as the top-chain predator symbolised the whole of nature.

If animals have been so important in the shaping of the human mind and its cultures, we ought to wonder about what our treatment of animals is doing to us as human beings.

We ought to take a look at what has happened to us as we moved from a primal and tribal existence (in which we lived outdoors in the presence of animals) to become civilised modern humans (where animals have been either eliminated or deformed and we live insulated from nature). This process has been going on for about eight or nine thousand years, beginning roughly with the advent of agriculture - especially the domestication (or subjugation) of animals.

Now we have reached such an advanced stage of civilisation that we're wondering what we're doing to the earth and to ourselves. These animals, such as the tiger, are very impressive to people. They are deeply imprinted into the cultures of peoples around the world. So that when the tiger is gone in Asia and the elephants are gone in Africa, the human cultures and societies there will be ripped from their roots.

It won't be Asia. It won't be Africa. They will be places sterilised of the animals who gave shape to the human cultures there.

We have adult-erated ourselves. What has happened during this long process is that we have reversed our relationship with animals. Where once we saw animals as powers, mysteries, deities, spirits and as brothers and sisters, we are now - after thousands of years of agriculture and mastery over nature - in a wholly different relationship with them. Once we started using animals as slaves (as livestock) and started eradicating all animal life around our villages and cities in the ancient Middle East and the other centres of civilisation, we had to reinvent our relationship with animals.

And when people reinvent their relationship with the earth they destroy the old myths that served to explain the world and they replace them with new ones. People do the same with religions. Before agriculture, men and women were more or less equal, animals were important, and we felt a part of the natural world. Several thousand years later, we have dammed up (once sacred) rivers to irrigate croplands, we have clear-cut (once sacred) forests to increase cropland, and we have exterminated top-chain predators so that we can husband livestock. So, along the way, we have had to invent new myths and stories that have the cumulative effect of reinventing ourselves as the god-licensed masters of the world.

We get some glimpse of this re-inventing process in the early stories in the Bible, which were beginning to be written down about 800BC (but were already old then). In these, one can see the destruction of beliefs not only in the powers of animals, but the powers of female deities as well. Around the world, emerging agricultural-period religions replaced the Old Stone Age religions that had animal and female-centred spirits and deities. As a result, we now have what we call Western, patriarchal culture, which is a nature-dominating, human-supremacist culture.

So what does this mean to us today? It means that we really think we are entitled to master the world. It means that we think we deserve to own animals and nature and to treat them as slaves.

And it means that we can arrogantly call up ancient powers of animals to demonstrate our mastery over them. We have rituals: bullfights, circuses, rodeos, zoos, hunting and the like. These are some of the activities in which we remind ourselves of our power over animals - and, in turn, our power over all of nature. Now all of this is not consciously done. It is an accumulation of decades - centuries - of subjugating animals and inventing myths and rituals to rationalise it all.

Look what we do to the elephants in circuses, for example. There is probably no more powerful and dignified animal than the great, grey elephant - the true Lord of the jungle. But when one sees an elephant in the circus, it is a clown, a buffoon - a buffoon, dancing and doing degrading tricks in a silly costume. And this, not so coincidentally, is the great treat (or training session) for children: We take them to the circus, and we adult-erate them. The rodeo, for another example: It evolved as a way for Western frontiersmen (cattle and horse exploiters), to celebrate their mastery over these animals - the symbols of their mastery over the land of the West. So now people keep celebrating this by going to a public place where they have comfortable seats, soft drinks, popcorn, etc. and they sit and watch other people torture animals. The whole town sits and watches men twist bull's tails and wrestle them to the ground. And all the while, they are drawing upon the power of the animals: Wild horses and wild bulls are some of the most powerful animals in the universe. That is why we see them in constellations and why we name so many of the powers in the sky after animal forms. The rodeo, then, helps people feel in a very visceral way how the West was won, that is to say, how macho cowboy skills (with the help of animal slaves) wrestled raw wilderness land into civilised countries and townships.

Today, more and more people are trying to challenge these myths and rituals. We are using every discipline there is - philosophy, science, law, anthropology, history, art, and others - to disturb this poisonous sleep that we have brought upon ourselves. Take note that there is more at stake here than saving animals from suffering and exploitation (as if that were not enough). We ought to protest as well the effects of our subjugation of animals on ourselves, on our humanity. We ought to stress the human cost of the enslavement of animals. As for the rituals just discussed, think about what these do to our children, how the rituals serve to adult-erate them into docile, accepting little subjugators.

But some will argue that these are teaching about wildlife and nature. Bear in mind that these ritual tortures and displays of animals in circuses and zoos are to wildlife and nature education what XXX pornographic films are to sex education. If we want to teach positive values about the living world and our belonging in it, then we shouldn't want children to see things that show over and over again our macho power and mastery over the life in the world.

Pathworkings for Animal Liberation

What is Pagan Animal Rights? How may the idea of animal rights be justified from the point of view of modern paganism? How can some of the ideas of pagans in ancient times be reconciled with animal rights, given that animal rights was not something that most pagans in the past appeared to have lost any sleep over? But modern pagans do lose sleep over these questions; the following may explain why this should be.

Firstly, it is inconsistent to talk about revering the earth on one hand, and to exploit animals on the other. This belief arises from the recognition of the unconditionality of the Earth's bounty, something which, it is believed, all ancient pagan societies recognised as part of their religious practice and belief system. But if we are only nice to animals as long as they provide us with milk and meat (and related by-products), then this conditionality stands in contrast with the unconditionality of the Earth's bounty. By not exploiting animals we show our compassion towards them. This compassion is as bountiful as the Earth's own harvest - something which need not require our own sacrifice.

Secondly, it is held by modern pagans because all animals are sacred to the goddess and god, therefore there ought to be a taboo against harming them. Nearly all ancient pagan belief-systems included the idea of totem animals which were thought to be the manifestations of the tribal deity, and should therefore be protected from exploitation by taboo. For example, in the Mabinogion (The Welsh Red Book and White Book) there is a story of Bran the Blessed, a superhuman hero whose name means 'Raven'. After his death the decapitated head could still speak and act as a protector. It was buried in London on the White Mound, where the Tower of London was subsequently built. The ravens in the tower were thought to be protectors of this island, and must be left undisturbed lest Britain be invaded. But the identification of the man-god Bran with the living birds is clear. The modern pagan belief that it is not just one creature but all creatures that are sacred to their deities is simply an extension of the ancient pagan belief.

Thirdly, the idea of the land being sacred - also an ancient pagan belief - has also been extended, in the minds of some modern pagans to include all living creatures, not just the environment in which they live. There is a modern conviction that the Earth was not created for humans, or even, for that matter, for the gods. It grew of itself, as though the Earth was a living being; in that case, all living beings are part of that one living being. Whilst humans, too, are part of the sentience of the Earth, nevertheless, it would be inconsistent to think that we would be morally justified to take the lives of other living beings. We would then be failing to recognise the right to life of the planet as represented in the right to life of each individual animal living on Earth. It is perhaps the human ability to recognise this that makes humans unique; we are evolving towards the ability to survive without exploiting animals. The philosophy of environmentalism, expressed religiously in ancient days, is now increasingly concerned with the issue of animal rights. This concern is now being expressed in religious terms by Pagan Animal Rights.

Although a concern for both respecting the environment and the sacredness of animals have their roots in ancient pagan belief-systems, the modern pagan outlook with regard to these issues is clearly an extension - as the modern pagans would like to see it - of the ancient beliefs, not a total reshaping of them. All modern pagans - even those who are not particularly concerned with animal rights - are very keen to claim their roots in ancient pagan cultures. In this, Pagan Animal Rights is no different, indeed it is enough merely to demonstrate any connection with such ancient roots to justify believing in animal rights from the modern pagan point of view. There is no need to reconcile the modern pagan point of view with the ancient one.

PAR POINTS...

- We should be as unconditional in our dealings with animals and as bountiful in our Love towards animals as the Earth is to us.
- All animals are sacred - and they are sacred to the deities of pagan belief.
- Every being is part of the sacred land. We should, therefore, protect all beings, that are part of the Sacred Land, from abuse; we should treat the parts of the whole as we would treat the whole itself.
- These modern ideas are, generally speaking extensions of ancient pagan ideas.

Thank You...

Dear Police Officers,

I would like to express my gratitude for your behaviour towards animal liberationists over the last twelve months. It has been well up to the standard of previous years and hopefully this is a trend that will continue.

Thank you for arresting peaceful protesters on ludicrous charges that are later dropped. And for making their friends travel round all the local police stations trying to locate their whereabouts. Thank you for detaining people until the early hours of the morning when they have to travel many miles back home. The money that should be forthcoming when you are successfully sued for false arrest and imprisonment should come in useful.

Thank you for spraying demonstrators in the face with CS gas at close range. It has resulted in very favourable press for us. And it also has turned many 'fluffy' protesters into the spiky anarchist types you like so much. As before, the compensation claims will be put to very good use.

Thank you for spending hundreds of thousands of pounds of taxpayer's money on chasing activists for relatively minor 'crimes' such as liberating animals from horrendous abuse. It only serves to show people how you are driven by a political motivation to suppress our movement against the powerful interests protecting animal abuse. And every prisoner stands as a massive inspiration to other more up-till-now law-abiding animal lovers.

Thank you for treating us all as criminals by filming and photographing demonstrations as a matter of routine. It has taught us well the advantages of a uniform dress code that has undoubtedly saved numerous activists from arrest and imprisonment. It has also introduced 'normal' people to useful headwear such as the balaclava and the face-mask. Foxhunters in particular are very keen to bring their offspring out with them when confronted with combat-gearred sabs in balaclavas.

Thank you for using phone-taps and other covert surveillance techniques in an attempt to entrap activists. It has made many people more security-conscious when discussing certain activities. This has made ALF cells much less susceptible to infiltration or exposure by yourselves.

Thank you for trying to suppress reporting of direct action against animal abuse. Your blatant stupidity in ever bringing the Gandalf defendants to trial has backfired spectacularly. You have succeeded in uniting the radical press and enthusing it with a determination to smash censorship and publish more forward-thinking articles. The quashing of the Gandalf convictions shows how even the judicial establishment realise you can't stop the truth.

Thank you for pushing untrue and biased information about us to the press. Those who practice animal abuse get ever more scared by the exaggerated image of our movement you help to promote. Those who support our cause see through your lies anyway: it only serves to make them trust you even less, and to disbelieve you even when you do speak the truth.

Thank you for attempting to discourage people from attending demonstrations by your heavy-handedness and brutality. This has encouraged us to draw in more new people to the movement, to expand and flourish. This has also made many activists realise the massive potential of other activities, such as direct action and other behind-the-scenes work. You have frustrated people and made them realise that in many cases, the ALF will succeed in one night where many hours, days or years of legal campaigning have failed.

Thank you for all these facets of your war against justice and compassion; of criminalizing good, caring people. The last few years have seen a steady increase in direct action against animal abuse. I look forward to seeing the current rise of the Animal Liberation Front continue unabated thanks to your actions.

Thank you, police, for everything.

(Now that, Alanis, is irony! -Ed.)

Hacked to Death

by Faroe Islanders

- Is stopping it an Animal Liberation Issue?

Around 200 miles from the UK, every year hundreds and sometimes thousands of pilot whales and other dolphins (cetaceans) are brutally driven into shallow bays by motorised boats, gaffed with a metal 5lb hook, on which is attached a long haul rope to drag them on to the beach. The animals are finally finished off, with a cut from a knife, behind the blow hole, which is supposed to sever the spinal cord. Some of the whales are eaten and some of the meat is left to rot. In 1985, Faroese radio advice was not to throw whale meat into the dustbin, as it was too heavy.

Unless, the animals manage to escape (which is rare) none are spared the Grind (Faroese name for the hunt). Pregnant, lactating, young and old, whole pods possibly migrating to the British Isles are mercilessly killed. Drives have been known to take up to 10 hours.

In 1996, whilst the annual International Whaling Commission (IWC) meeting was in progress in Aberdeen, the Faroese killed 400 animals and a few days later over 300 more, showing the scant regard they have for the IWC or world opinion. Total kill that we know about for that year was 1524 Pilot whales.

Cetacea Defence has been doing its utmost for years to draw attention to the 'Islanders from hell' carnage including:

- Rooftop demos at the Faroe Sea food factory in Grimsby in '92 and '93.
- Occupation of the consulate in Aberdeen in '96.
- Disruption to a Faroese jazz band playing in Wigan in '96.
- Between 500-600 information stalls, mainly in the north west, since the launch of the boycott in '93, street theatres and checkouts blocked with 'unwanted' Faroese fish.
- Targeting the UK sellers of frozen Faroese fish - Marks & Spencer's, (the biggest), Tesco's, Sainsbury's, the Somerfield chain (David Gregg, Solo and Food Giant), with tens of thousands of leaflets and postcards highlighting the call for a boycott of their stores for complicity in supporting the Faroe slaughter.
- With the help of CD, Finns for Whales organisation, have just launched a campaign in Finland (Oct. 8th). Finland is a major importer of Faroe Isles fish. CD is also producing a new full colour postcard, highlighting the issue.

Last year, CD commissioned an investigation on the Islands as no film had come out since the EIA one in '92. It was important to know what was going on, especially as the islanders have experimented with a new gaff. Their way of trying to offset international condemnation is to introduce a rounded gaff, one that would go into the blowhole of the animal and suffocate it. One wonders if there is a word in the Faroese language for humane.

Film secretly shot in 1997 shows a kill of 5 animals, zodiacs ramming into animals and the illegal (by their laws) use of a spear. At this drive, some Pilots did escape. Film was also shot of the aftermath of a kill of 159 Pilot whales, which is not for the squeamish. It shows unborn fetuses, heads of whales, etc.; Some footage has been used by a German television company in a documentary exposing the slaughter.

In the past, certain organisations have tried and I believe failed in direct intervention. Think of it, 48 thousand Islanders angrily defending their bloodsport, against a zodiac or two. Unless you are prepared to be anchored in situ for long periods (drives are opportunistic) with a mother ship and zodiacs, direct action of this sort is impractical and financially costly (anyone got a ship to donate?).

One certain way to bring these Islanders to their knees, is an effective boycott of their fish. Their economy is over 90% dependent on fish exports. It is single issue; it is also pragmatic. Cetacea Defence does not advocate that anyone should buy fish, NOT sourced from the Faroese. CD does explain how industrialised fishing is killing all life.

To summarise, since the 1993 boycott campaign, Asda, Safeway, Iceland and the Co-op haven't sold fish from the Faroe Isles. The Faroese lost a reported £12 million. Marks & Spencer, the major seller of frozen fish from the Faroe Isles, and other stores have consistently refused to implement a boycott. But, as a result of the campaign, they now label fish from the Faroe Isles - not good enough, but they THINK they can escape criticism.

However, why with a 1986 moratorium in place, are the Faroese allowed to kill whales, you will ask?!

The Pilot Whale is a member of the genera of small cetaceans as are the other cetaceans they kill. The IWC has only recently recognised its competence in dealing with small cetaceans. For years Denmark (the Faroe Isles are an old colony) and Japan had blocked any such moves. The 1979 Berne Convention of European Wildlife, prohibits the use of all indiscriminate means of capture and killing. The Bonn convention of 1988 is an agreement to conserve small cetaceans in the North and Baltic seas. Denmark, although a signatory to both, introduced clauses to exempt the Faroe Isles.

The title of this article is to make you think about how you can help stop the 'bloody Faroese', that's if the pollutants (mercury, PCBs, etc.) in the whale meat consumed doesn't stop them first, any ideas? Having been in the movement for 17 years, I have always felt there was / is a consensus of opinion that whaling and dolphinariums were / are Friends of the Earth or Greenpeace type issues. Well are they, or can we all do more to help? If the latter is the case there is enough info in this article to give you ideas, or contact me.

Thanks to the vegan investigator who had to stomach the kills in the Faroe Isles, Russell S and some of the good people in the Manchester area whose donations made the investigation financially happen.

I will conclude with a quote some years ago by Arni Olafsen, who stated that the hunt continued for: "Tradition, sport and a way of obtaining cheap food." Only 200 miles from our shores, it's time to relegate their sport to the history books.

July 4TH - World Day for Captive Dolphins

This year, actions were in Finland, Sweden, US (2), Canada (2), Japan, Philippines and Belgium. So after 6 years of initiating the day, I am feeling a little pleased that it is beginning to develop into a World event. Following in the tradition of, "We would rather go naked than... etc.", some brave women in Canada did a, "We would rather go topless than go in Marineland." They then improvised with a, "We would rather stand in the pissing rain than go in."

Unfortunately, duty called and I had to be in Finland for the annual 2 day + day of action meeting of the Cetacean Freedom Network. Well, where does a UK activist go - activism having closed the UK department of global exploitation? All you youngsters reading Arkangel might not know there was only decades ago 30 odd shows here. So CFN was in Helsinki for the meet, then travelled 150 miles north to the prison at Tampere, 'home' to 4 wild-caught dolphins and 2 born there + 11 dead, in just 13 years. Now here is a case of corruption, in 1984 the country passed a law banning the performance of wild mammals excluding dolphins. As the 'narium opened in 1985, I wonder who got the backhanders there? To even the score, due to the campaign, the country has since passed another law banning any further imports of dolphins, at the rate they die in captivity and with a big push, it is inevitable WE will close it.

On my last visit it had been coooold -22, so in a very warm +30, we held our action day. This got mega media attention, national TV3 reports, local TV and radio and press. We also held a public forum which was well-attended. The demo at the gates was excellent - grim reapers, dolphin-shaped coffins, banners, thousands of leaflets given out and a very vocal 2-3 hours of shouting, "Dolphins belong to the oceans of the world!" (in Finnish!). Some of the local activists had obviously been trained over here, adding, "Go home scum"!

ANIMAL LIBERATION PRISONERS

Arkangel gives its full support to animal liberation prisoners. We list only the names of prisoners and ask people to contact the ALFSG for up-to-date information, prison numbers and addresses. This is because Arkangel Magazine is produced less frequently than the ALFSG information and could be out of date by the time you read it.

The Menopausal Helpline Ltd.

This is a voluntary organisation founded by Maggie Tuttle after she suffered serious side effects from Hormone Replacement Therapy. Immediately she began to suffer unbearable headaches but each time she complained to her doctor, he prescribed a different drug. These also had side effects but doctors never linked them with the drugs they were prescribing. She decided to stop taking HRT after losing nearly all her hair. She now takes natural alternative remedies and most of her ailments have greatly improved, and her hair is now back to normal.

Maggie set up the helpline after she realised that there were many other women with similar problems and no organisation that could listen and offer help. To date, over 8,000 women have contacted her by letter or phone. Menopausal Helpline have set up a petition which makes these demands:

- 1) to set up a Central Advisory Service to co-ordinate facilities and make balanced information available, so that women can make their own independent choice of treatment.
- 2) to make natural alternative remedies available to women under the National Health Service. Only recently natural alternatives have become available in some UK surgeries. However in most areas, these are unknown to GPs and women are obliged to pay for them privately.
- 3) to standardise homeopathic treatment in our National Health Service. Homeopathic medicine has a long and successful track record in dealing with hormonal problems.
- 4) to make it obligatory for all pharmaceutical companies to put comprehensive health warnings on all hormonal drugs.

The Road to Victory

compiled by Martin Masterman-Lister

Members of the House Agriculture Committee in Florida have voted to outlaw mule diving. This involves mules and horses climbing up a high ramp and diving into a pool of water. The law will make it illegal to conduct exhibitions involving riderless mules, donkeys and horses that fall 10 feet or more. (Independent 16.3.1998)

At Severn Trent's Netherbridge treatment works near Gloucester, sympathetic sewerage workers have set up a rescue service for amphibians. Huge numbers are washed off the roads and down drains, and they face death at the next stage of sewerage processing. So human volunteers cycle round the large works beside the River Severn, looking for victims. They scoop the amphibians out of the settlement tanks and take them to a wetland conservation area on site, eventually being released into the surrounding countryside. 2,000 are saved in a year. (Independent 16.3.1998)

The President of the Scottish National Farmers Union, George Lyon, was yesterday fined £400 after pleading guilty to two charges involving the treatment of sheep on his farm. (Independent 31.3.1998)

The government yesterday published the names of 48 growers and suppliers of organically grown soya beans, a move against the domination of staple foods by multinationals. (Guardian 31.3.1998)

J.J. the grey whale rescued as an infant and raised in captivity was returned to the Pacific Ocean yesterday. (Guardian 1.4.1998)

A former circus worker was charged with six counts of cruelty to elephants. Michael Gills, 64, of Shipton Bellinger, Hants., worked for Chipperfield circus at its headquarters in Over Wallop, Hampshire. (Times 1.4.1998)

A ram broke a farmer's leg in two places by butting him. Jimmy Spence, 72, later underwent surgery. (Times 1.4.1998)

A bus driver stopped outside a McDonalds restaurant in Sutton Coldfield and dumped a pile of fast-food containers left on his bus, in the foyer. (Guardian 1.4.1998)

The first doctor publicly to voice concerns that BSE posed a significant threat to humans said he was ignored by the Government. In 1988 he published an article in the British Medical Journal saying the issues raised by the disease were being ignored by the food industry with vested interests, a medical profession with little veterinary knowledge and a government eager to avoid a food scare. (Independent 1.4.1998)

Burger eaters in fast food restaurants were yesterday warned to send back undercooked food to reduce the risk of food poisoning. Public Health Laboratory scientists investigated 85 cases of people falling ill over two years and found eating burgers from restaurants was a significant factor. Farm visits and contact with cattle also seems to raise the risks of infection. (Guardian 3.4.1998)

The RSPCA is to launch an enquiry into the deaths of three horses during yesterday's Grand National. Since 1980, twelve horses have died. (Observer 5.4.1998)

Anthrax bacteria found in the walls and ceilings of London's Kings Cross railway station probably came from infected horsehair used to bind the plaster in the 19th century. The spores were active but had been safely sealed in. (Observer 5.4.1998)

A rare parrot bit the Deputy Prime Minister's finger as he posed for photographs at the International Environmental Summit at Leeds Castle. Experts said the bird's beak had a pressure of 340 pounds per square inch. (Observer 5.4.1998)

For the first time in 10 years, Romania's Black Sea coastline has been flooded with thousands of shellfish, a sign it is getting cleaner. The Black Sea is heavily polluted by organic run-off from rivers which have robbed the sea of 90% of its oxygen. The Black Sea action plan signed in 1996 promised improved sewerage control, regional conservation strategies and a study into setting up an environmental fund. (Independent 6.4.1998)

A British company is offering the first DNA test which will allow consumers to find out whether foods they are eating contain genetically modified materials. A joint venture between Nuclyx and the Leatherhead Food Research Association will allow supermarket chains to test common brands of food and drink which may contain GM soya grown in the US. (Independent 6.4.1998)

Hamburgers in commercial fast food joints might not be sufficiently cooked to kill off bacteria, such as E-coli 0157. 19 people died in 1996 in Scotland in one outbreak from this bug. In 1993, undercooked hamburgers caused a large outbreak in the US affecting 732 people, while an outbreak in Malawi affected 20,000. (Independent 6.4.1998)

Animal welfare campaigners are urging egg farmers to help free millions of laying hens imprisoned in tiny cages. CIWF presented a report on the problem to the National Farmers Union in London yesterday. The document outlines the case against cruel battery cages and calls for them to be phased out. (Independent 9.4.1998)

The first world list of threatened plants was launched yesterday in a bid to save more than one in 10 species in 200 countries, including 19 in Britain. (Independent 9.4.1998)

Salmonella infection in eggs is just as bad now, as it was when Edwina Curry triggered a food scare in 1988. A survey by the Public Health laboratory (PHL) for the Dept. of Health found that in 1991 the contamination level was one in every 650 eggs. By 1996/7, despite the slaughter of 2 million chickens, the level was one in every 700 eggs. The virulent S. enteritidis was found in one in every 1,320 eggs. Professor Richard Lacey who first drew attention to the problem in the 1980's said the reason was because they replaced the slaughtered flocks with new, infected flocks. It is still eggs, which is causing salmonella poisoning. In 1988, despite being correct, the then food minister was forced to resign. (Independent 9.4.1998)

Wildlife experts are tending a European Spoonbill which was blown hundreds of miles off course when heading for breeding grounds in Europe. Experts believe the bird will soon be sufficiently recovered to be released. (Independent 11.4.1998)

Red squirrels are being given tightropes over roads on the Isle of Wight. The local colony has suffered badly from road fatalities but an experiment with tightropes, carried out by NPI Red Alert, gave grounds for hope. (Guardian 13.4.1998)

Police fired rubber bullets at Brazilian locals engaged in ox baiting, now classed as a crime except in special areas. An ox is released into the street, then chased and provoked until it collapses from exhaustion, when it is ritually slaughtered. Eleven people were arrested. (Guardian 13.4.1998)

McDonalds could face up to 10 claims from people who allegedly suffered serious burns from its hot drinks. (Independent 17.4.1998)

The ALF has released pheasants at the John Lewis estate in the South. (Meridian TV News 17.4.1998)

The Walt Disney Company is facing allegations of cruelty to animals after a bizarre series of deaths that have threatened the opening of its new theme park in Florida. At least a dozen creatures at Animal Kingdom, Disney's glorified zoo, have prompted protests while the Agriculture Department is investigating possible violations of the Animal Welfare Act. The Animal Rights Foundation of Florida has run newspaper advertisements charging Disney with cruelty and plans to picket Wednesday's opening. (Sunday Times 19.4.1998)

Thousands of animal experiments could be halted this summer after publication of new conditions under which Home Office Inspectors license such work. The pursuit of profit would no longer be allowed as justification for experiments. The news coincides with UN recognised World Lab Animal Day this Friday. One scientist said experiments carried out by pharmaceutical companies to test drugs similar to those already on the market were the type that could be halted. (Independent on Sunday 19.4.1998)

The first vegetarian approved beer, Viva, goes on sale in pubs this week. Viva, a beer brewed using only vegan ingredients, will become the first to bear the 'V' sign and the Society's endorsement. (Independent on Sunday 19.4.1998)

10 people were arrested and several others hurt during clashes when more than 800 activists surrounded Hillgrove farm in Witney, Oxfordshire, where cats are bred for pharmaceutical purposes. Missiles were thrown at farm buildings and offices. At the height of the clashes demonstrators tried to storm the farm buildings as farmer Chris Brown, his wife and son, sheltered inside. (Observer 19.4.1998)

A woman told yesterday how she found her elderly mother dead on the floor, a victim of the world's worst recorded outbreak of E-coli 0157 food poisoning, which claimed 20 lives. The victim was in the habit of eating a cold meat sandwich every day. (Independent 21.4.1998)

The circus owner, Mary Chipperfield, 60, has been charged with 15 offences of cruelty to animals. The circus headquarters is at Croft Farm, Over Wallop, Hampshire. (Independent 23.4.1998)

Customs officials on a Slovenian ship berthed in Edinburgh discovered an illegal haul of animal carcasses during a swoop. Stuffed alligators, a salamander and a turtle shell were found by officers. (Independent 24.4.1998)

A Gallup poll carried out in 1997 showed that around 5.5% of the population classed themselves as vegetarian, (i.e. they eat no meat, animal by-products or fish). On top of that around 9% avoid red meat. A poll carried out last year for the Vegetarian Society found that overall, 41% of people were eating less meat than in the past. Concern for animal welfare is the reason that 50% of their members don't eat meat. Around 25% cite health reasons; others mention environmental reasons. Vegetarians tend to eat less fat and more fibre than meat eaters and this means lower rates of heart disease, high blood pressure and obesity. (Independent on Sunday 26.4.1998)

The RSPCA said that convictions for animal cruelty rose from 2,282 in 1996 to 2,650 last year. (Independent 29.4.1998)

Around 200 people in Slovakia were treated in hospital after eating sausages made from dog meat. (Independent 1.5.1998)

The red kite died out following persecution in Britain, but was re-introduced in 1989 when the RSPB, English Nature and Scottish Natural Heritage, imported young birds from Spain. Since then, the birds' population has built up with amazing speed. In the 1997 season 51 pairs in England reared more than 100 young, and earlier this year in Buckinghamshire 70 kites were counted in a single gathering. (Independent 2.5.98)

The Alternative Veterinary Medicine Centre treats all animals with alternative medicine. Their address is Medicine Centre, Stanford-in-the-Vale, Faringdon, Oxfordshire SN7 8NQ (01367 710475) (Independent 9.5.1998)

A campaign to dispel negative myths about bats has been launched by the Bat Conservation Trust Campaign. (Independent on Sunday 10.5.1998)

A health warning has been issued after a boy from Somerset was treated for E-coli infection after possible eating a Caerphilly-type cheese made by a local firm, Duckett & Co. (Independent on Sunday 10.5.1998)

A 53 year old woman will be awarded £10,000 damages today by Kent police in the latest payout to animal rights demonstrators arrested trying to stop live exports to Europe. The police face at least 12 more claims, having paid small sums of £900 to £2,500 to at least 3 animal welfare protesters. (Independent 14.5.1998)

Iush Yushan National Park in Taiwan is now a safer place for thousands of Formosan rock monkeys following the construction of a monkey crossing above a busy road, after the deaths of several monkeys in recent years. (Independent 15.5.1998)

About 500 basking sharks gathered off Cornwall, forcing some fishermen on shore. A Wildlife Trust spokeswoman said the animals can be up to 35ft long and if one surfaced under a boat, it could be dangerous. (Independent 16.5.1998)

Helen Steel, one of the McLibel protesters, will today make a court challenge to the Government over its 600-year-old breach of the peace legislation, which has never been defined by Parliament. Ms. Steel will appear before the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg to claim her arrest and detention for attempting to disrupt a grouse shoot, was a breach of her human rights. She is among six plaintiffs who are claiming that the breach of the peace law of 1361 is being used by police to deny people their right to freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. Liberty is supporting the cases. (Independent 18.5.1998)

Stella McCartney, the fashion designer, yesterday challenged Tony Blair in a letter to keep his pre-election promise to ban fur farms. Representing PETA, she also sent a six-minute video, which showed foxes and mink suffering gruesome deaths at the hands of a farmer. (Guardian 19.5.1998)

A decision, by farmer Peter Lemon of Wiltshire, not to allow field trials of genetically modified oil seed rape on his property, was hailed by environmentalists as a serious blow to the industry. (Guardian 19.5.1998)

Professor Andrew Linzey, an animal rights ethicist from Oxford University, says it's a slow and plodding move towards animal rights but it is making significant progress.

More than half of young people believe that medical experiments are unscientific. (Independent on Sunday 29.5.1998)

ARKANGEL MAGAZINE : BCM 9240, LONDON WC1N 3XX

Welcome to Arkangel Twenty-One!

Ten years ago, Ronnie Lee and Vivian Smith (we wish you well Viv, wherever you may be) founded Arkangel. Over the past ten years, the magazine has witnessed some highs and lows and we would like to thank our supporters who have kept us going and our voluntary helpers who have given both their time and their commitment so that we may carry on. Arkangel often relies upon the honesty of those who order it and we have several shops who carry it. Our thanks go out to Active Distribution who act as our main distributors abroad and to our regular subscribers. However, it saddens me to have to report that there are some dishonest people who are quite happy to rip us off. A radical bookshop in Manchester, Frontline Books, is a perfect example. Fortunately, these people are few and far between.

A new magazine is now available.

Biteback carries on where Turning Point left off and we encourage people to obtain a copy. The magazine is designed to appeal to the general public and to inform them of the horrors of animal abuse.

We would like to ask our readers to take out a subscription for Arkangel Magazine. This will help us financially and will guarantee that you receive a copy through the post. The magazine subscription costs just £10 for 4 issues (UK), £6 (unwaged) or £15 (outside of UK). The cover price has only risen by £1 in the past ten years!

We encourage everyone to write to animal liberation prisoners (even just a few words) who have given their liberty to help protect animals and ask you to support the Animal Liberation Front (Supporters Group) and the Vegan Prisoners Support Group.

Lastly, animal abuse exists in many forms and allows certain industries to reap vast amounts of money literally off the backs of innocent creatures. Whether you hold street stalls, give out information leaflets, attend demonstrations, complete petitions, carry out direct action, take in animals or just encourage others to adopt a vegan lifestyle, every single action will help to bring animal liberation a step closer.

A nostalgic reminder of the cover of the very first Arkangel!

Arkangel Back Issues & Cards

Arkangel Back Issues:

Numbers 2, 4, 17, 18 & 20 are still available and are FREE of charge!

(But please send 50p per copy to cover the postage - £1 outside of the UK).

Cards:

Three cards featuring cats and one card featuring the 'The Rats Revenge' are available.

Each card costs just 10p
(please send SAE).

100+ cards cost 5p each

VEGAN VILLAGE

Since the last issue of Arkangel the vegan village has been on a bit of a roll. 35 new vegan run companies and groups have been added to the listings, which have been extended to include a 'vegan entertainers' section.

In January, Ethical Ware's vegan village website was listed in a '10 places to shop online' article in The Guardian newspaper, and then in February the vegan village itself was the BBC Vegetarian Good Food Magazine's website of the month. This extra coverage has attracted even more visitors to the website, which has a knock-on effect for the vegan companies and groups which are listed. One of the groups, Animal Action in Middlesborough, has received around 150 email enquiries as a direct result of being featured on the website.

There have been some new additions in terms of people taking their own websites within the vegan village. Alison Coe's new website includes pictures of her beautiful handmade greeting cards, plus her intricate woven pieces, which feature animal designs. Swamp Circus's website has a section advertising their performance arts workshops to be held in Cornwall to coincide with the Eclipse. The very latest website is for Veg Chinese in Knightsbridge which is an amazing vegan restaurant. And, of course, the vegan village is hosting the website for the Second National Vegan Festival which takes place in London on Sunday 15 August 1999.

If you would like to see some of the websites mentioned above, you can find them all on the vegan village at www.veganvillage.co.uk. You will also find links to hundreds of other vegan websites, in the UK and abroad, plus an online noticeboard and a newstand. Happy surfing!

The Second National Vegan Festival

The second National Vegan Festival will take place on Sunday 15th August 1999 at the Camden Centre, Bidborough Street, London WC1, which is directly opposite St. Pancras Station and just minutes from Kings Cross and Euston underground / mainline stations. The Camden Centre is on the Euston Road and is easily accessible by bus. There will be some parking space in the area.

The Camden Centre is a very large, spacious building which has excellent facilities. The Festival will be open from 10am - 7pm and entry is just £1.

The sponsors of the Festival - Vegan Village, Ethical Wares, Plamil Foods and Festival organisers, CALF - welcome vegans, vegetarians, non-vegetarians and children to spend the day eating, drinking and generally being merry.

Festivities will include informal entertainment and discussions. You can browse at the information/commercial stalls, buy tasty snacks, or simply relax in a friendly atmosphere. Food provided by Leaves of Life, Veggies and VegVeg will be available in the dining area and snacks will be available in the main hall. The bar will be run by The Beer Shop / Pitfield Brewery who will be selling vegan /organic beer, cider and wine.

Stall holders include:

Animal Aid,
Viva!,
Farm Animal Rescue, Vegan Society,
Miso,
Ambrosian Foods,
ALF Press Office,
Daydream Cosmetics,
Plamil Foods,
Veganline,
London Animal Action,

FEMINISTS FOR ANIMAL RIGHTS

Feminists for Animal Rights is dedicated to ending all forms of abuse against women and animals. Because exploitation of women and animals derives from the same patriarchal mentality, FAR attempts to expose the connection between sexism and speciesism whenever and wherever they can. FAR feel that the common denominator in the lives of women and animals is violence - either real or threatened - and the group work in non-violent ways to change that.

FAR attempts to raise the consciousness of the feminist community, the animal rights community and the general public about the connections between the objectification, exploitation and abuse of women and animals in patriarchal society.

As ecofeminists, the group are concerned about cultural and racial injustice and the devaluation and destruction of nature and the earth. They view patriarchy as a system of hierarchical domination, a system which works for the powerful and willing against the powerless and unwilling.

FAR is dedicated to the promotion of vegetarianism because they believe the feminist precept that the personal is political. As Carol Adams states, not eating the flesh of dead animals is one way of "putting feminism into action".

FAR are vegan in their orientation because it is desirable to work towards the elimination of all products derived from or tested on animals - in food, clothing, household products, and so on.

Animal Liberation is a Feminist Issue

In patriarchal society women and animals are:

- beaten, raped, hated, enslaved as pets, exploited as wives, sold for money, used for entertainment, cheap labour, sex, experiments...

In patriarchal society women and animals are considered:

- inferior, "cute", childish, uncontrollable, emotional, impulsive, instinctive, irrational, evil, property, objects...

In patriarchal society women and animals are referred to as:

- chicks, bitches, pussies, foxes, dogs, cows, beavers, birds, bunnies, kittens, sows, lambs, hens, shrews, geese, fillies, bats, crows, heifers, vixens....

What Feminists for Animal Rights Do

The group are based in the USA and publish a newsletter and have regional chapters in almost a dozen cities across the United States and Canada. FAR volunteers are engaged in a number of ongoing projects. FAR volunteers have co-ordinated, in a number of locations, foster care programs for the companion animals of women in battered women's shelters. Companion Animal Rescue Effort (CARE) has been initiated in an effort to address the rampant violence against women and animals in our society. Those familiar with domestic violence know that, frequently, animals are victims of violence, and that often violence against them is used as a weapon against women and other family members.

Safehouses provide the companion animals of battered women with the security they need while the women are looking to make their own lives more secure. FAR provide foster care, veterinary care, lots of tender loving care for animals who may be traumatised, and respectful assistance for women who need support. FAR also provides speakers for school, activist, professional, community and religious groups. The most popular programme is the slide presentation "Animal Liberation Through an Ecofeminist Lens" created by FAR co-founder Marti Kheel. The show provides a history of the portrayal of women's relationship to other-than-human animals before and after patriarchy in art, religion, and mythology. It goes on to explore the connections between the objectification, exploitation, and abuse of women and animals in contemporary society, from pornography to the vivisection lab to the slaughterhouse.

The Far Reach of the Barbaric Fur Trade

News that coats and other products made of dog and cat fur are being sold around the world has shocked consumers in the UK and elsewhere. The revelations, announced on December 15, 1998, are the result of an 18 month undercover investigation conducted by the Humane Society of the United States (HSUS) / Humane Society International (HSI) and independent German journalist Manfred Karremann. A team of six investigators estimate that more than 2 million dogs and cats are killed for the fur trade each year.

Much of the enormous media attention focused on the discovery of parkas with dog fur trim being sold by Burlington Coat Factory stores in the USA. At one such outlet in New Jersey, HSUS investigators found jackets trimmed with what the label described as "Mongolia dog fur", which DNA testing confirmed to be canine. When presented with that information, Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse Corporation expressed its dismay and ordered all the coats to be removed from its stores.

Here in the UK, following the Newsnight programme recently horrific footage revealed cats and dogs skinned alive after having their jaws wired shut. The programme showed a puppy watching its friends being killed, the fear evident in its eyes knowing that it would be next. The previously secret trade of dog and cat fur imported into this country from China has prompted protest in North London, where Alaska Brokerage, Bellside House, Elthorne Road, Archway, are situated. Their registered address is 145-157, St. John's Street, London EC1V 4PY. Designers Dolce & Gabbana have been named as one of the companies importing this type of fur (they regularly use fur in their collections).

In the US, chief HSUS investigator Rick Swain gained access to fur facilities in China, making four trips to that country over a year and a half. Rick said that at the beginning he expected to uncover a small, black-market trade in cat and dog skins abroad. But what the investigative group found is a multimillion-dollar international industry. He witnessed hundreds of thousands of dog pelts in one warehouse. Dogs and cats are plentiful, profitable and available in China. Some of these animals are bred on farms where anywhere from five to 300 dogs, or up to 70 cats, might be kept as breeding stock. Other animals may have been strays. In Harbin, north of Beijing, investigators witnessed dogs shivering in a dark, unheated building in the midst of winter, tethered by wire nooses, without food or water. This particular place, investigators were told, generally killed 10-12 dogs a day, selling their flesh and fur. The investigator reports that he saw dogs being butchered who were still conscious as the skinning began. Undercover videotape shows a German shepherd blinking his eye as he was being skinned. Cats suffer similarly awful fates. Investigators were told by people working at one Chinese fur market that the common method of killing is by hanging, sometimes with water hoses running into the cats' throats to drown them. Then a slit is made in the cat's stomach, the skin is opened, and the fur is pulled over the cat's head. The furriers say the cats may still be alive while they are being skinned.

In the course of the investigation, it became clear that dog and cat fur is inextricably linked to the international fur industry as a whole, and that companies dealing in dog and cat fur also deal in the pelts of other species. In a showroom in China, for example, investigators saw full-length dog and cat fur coats hanging next to coats made of mink and fox. At an auction house in Germany, 10,000 dressed dog furs from Korea were sold alongside those of foxes, mink, muskrats, bobcats, badgers and nutrias.

Anyone who thinks the way to avoid buying dog or cat fur products is to simply read the label is in for another shock. Complicating the whole labelling issue is the fact that many companies and individuals involved in the trade of dog and cat fur use pseudonyms and mislabelling to disguise the true identity of their products. For example, "gae wolf" is a popular fur in the lower-end German fur market. But even many German consumers don't know that "gae wolf" is one of the fur industry's pseudonyms for domestic dog, usually German shepherd. It was found that companies were willing to put any label in a garment that the customer wanted, effectively disguising the country of origin and the type of animal used. It is unlikely that many consumers or even fashion industry workers could recognise dog or cat fur if they saw it.

ANIMAL ABUSE IS
AS CAPITAL

On June 18th 1999 leaders of the Group of 7 (G7) leading capitalist states will meet in Köln. As ever they will be making decisions to ensure that a minority of the population continue to make profits at the expense of the rest of the world.

On this day thousands of people will come to protest in London and other financial districts across the globe against a system that puts profits before animals, people and the planet.

Why should the Animal Liberation Movement be involved?

The global capitalist system is at the root of animal abuse and must be destroyed if we are to achieve animal liberation. All over the world animals are being imprisoned, tortured and killed in pursuit of profits. The meat industry, fur trade and vivisection cause misery and suffering not only to millions of animals, but also to humans and the planet to make money for a few. Banks and other financial institutions support this animal abuse.

For example Natwest gave Huntingdon Life Sciences (one of the biggest vivisectioners in Europe) a loan to bail them out when they were in financial trouble following the exposure of extreme cruelty by laboratory staff, whilst Hillgrove Farm, breeders of kittens and cats for vivisection is being propped up by £750,000 a police bill - state sponsored private security against a public outrage.

We can't rely on governments to end the suffering of animals. Although governments may pay lip service to animal welfare, their main concern is protecting free trade and the real power lies with financial institutions and multi-nationals, which benefit from animal abuse.

Increasing globalisation of the economy is having a detrimental effect on animals, making even the smallest reforms impossible. For example, the GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) makes any ban on imports and exports illegal which means that although a country can ban a cruel practice it can't stop products that are being reared in a cruel way from being sold there. This means that

Two of the key animal rights achievements of the 90's - the banning of fur caught in the leghold trap and the ban on importing cosmetics tested on animals have not been upheld by the EU.

The EU has refused the ban on battery cages India's restrictions on the import and export of raw hides and furs is illegal.

Meanwhile the pursuit of profit for interest payments to investment institutions and for shareholder's dividends, leads to a 'free market' where the very genetic make-up of life itself is being patented, and animals are mutated or cloned to make the future of animal abuse more cost effective.

A global movement of resistance is rising - people are reclaiming control of their lives. Across the world social and ecological movements are coming together, talking, taking direct action and enacting radical alternatives to 'globalisation'. Groups are organising for actions to happen simultaneously on Friday June 18th in the financial districts of the world. The June 18th action gives us the opportunity to protest against and transform those institutions that are at the root of animal abuse. It will also enable us to make links with other movements to build a better world for all.

Meet 10.30am June 18th 1999 Farringdon Tube to demonstrate against Smithfields Meat Market and other animal abusers in the city.

HELP ARKANGEL HELP THE MOVEMENT HELP THE ANIMALS

How Arkangel Helps

The aim of Arkangel is to help the animal liberation movement. In furtherance of this aim Arkangel produces an informative magazine and has set up various projects to help local groups and animal rights campaigners both in this country and abroad. These projects include the supplying of information about animal abuse and animal abusers, publishing material useful to animal rights campaigners and helping to set up networks of groups in foreign countries.

How You Can Help Arkangel

All Arkangel workers are unpaid, but all these projects need money in order to function effectively. Therefore, one way in which you can help is to donate money or, better still, by doing regular fundraising for Arkangel. You can also become a local Arkangel contact, so that as well as organizing fundraising, you could help distribute the magazine, report on local group activities, or assist the Arkangel Information Project.

If you are able to help in any way, please complete the relevant part(s) of this form and return it to Arkangel, BCM 9240, London WC1N 3XX. Thanks.

ANATOMY OF A HEALTH DISASTER

The Workers Inquiry into the BSE/CJD crisis held in Sheffield on May 17th, 1997 was a unique event. Convened by the Socialist Equality Party, it was the first independent investigation into this public health disaster. The outcome of a 12 month campaign, the Workers Inquiry was the only forum which brought together all aspects of the crisis. It heard testimony from scientific experts, health and environmental professionals as well as the relatives of new variant CJD victims.

Its great strength was not only the new information it uncovered but the way it critically illuminated the inner workings of the present social order. The BSE/nvCJD crisis did not simply result from the corruption and hypocrisy of a few government ministers and civil servants. Their actions and inactions were determined by their defence of an economic system which subordinates every aspect of human and animal life to the drive for profits. The cover-up begun by the Tory government, and Labour's collusion with it, reveal how Parliament and the establishment parties are the political means through which this economic set-up is preserved.

The findings of the Workers Inquiry have been confirmed by subsequent scientific research. After years of denial, scientific evidence leaves only one conclusion: that nvCJD is BSE in human form and its source is infected beef and its derivatives. The human consequences of this crisis are being tragically confirmed in the rising number of deaths from nvCJD. It is only now, over 10 years since BSE was first recognised that consideration was given to convene a "non-accusatory" judicial inquiry into BSE/nvCJD. Ultimately, any such measure will be of a purely cosmetic character. As long as food production - and indeed all other basic requirements of life - remains privately controlled and geared towards profit, public health disasters such as nvCJD are inevitable. Subsequent outbreaks of E-coli poisoning from cooked meats, listeria in dairy products and the pollution of drinking water confirm this warning.

"A devastating indictment of a food industry run to satisfy big business's hunger for profit," says Dr. Jean Shaoul, lecturer at the Department of Accounting and Finance, Manchester University.

World Animal Net

Introduction

World Animal Net (WAN) is a global information network for animal protection organisations. Free trade, through the growing influence of the World Trade Organisation and GATT, the evolution of the European Union, and the opening up of Eastern European and Asian regions have given animal advocacy an increasingly global perspective. The World Animal Net network gives animal protection groups world-wide the opportunity to work in a genuine spirit of collaboration, sharing knowledge, expertise, professionalism, and campaign and lobbying resources. World Animal Net is the world's largest animal advocacy network with over 1,000 affiliated societies.

Policy

The only policy of World Animal Net is: "to improve the status and welfare of animals".

Structure

World Animal Net's activities are co-ordinated from offices in the UK and the USA. Their work is primarily conducted by experts and consultants from around the globe who donate their time and expertise, thereby ensuring low overhead, including minimal staff and office costs. In order to avoid excessive fund-raising costs and competition with affiliate societies, WAN does not seek individual memberships. Funding is largely provided by project grants from foundations and societies.

Services

World Animal Net Directory:

The WAN directory is the world's largest collection of animal protection contacts, with more than 8,000 organisations in 130 countries. The Directory is available in book form and can be viewed on the website (see below) which provides links to more than 1,800 websites of animal protection organisations.

E-mail Newsgroups:

Animal protection societies who have Internet access and want to stay informed about the latest developments can subscribe to WAN's e-mail lists free of charge. There are subject specific lists on:

- ◆ Anti-Fur ◆ Experimentation
- ◆ Farm Animals ◆ Animals in Entertainment

'ARKANGEL' COMES OF AGE ...

Congratulations to Arkangel magazine on reaching issue number 21; this year is a double celebration as we also see its tenth anniversary! All this despite Animal Aid's Mark Gold describing it as "a nasty little magazine". You, the readers, have made your choice so "well done" to Arkangel.

HUNGER STRIKE III - THE BACKLASH

Barry Horne's third hunger strike - highlighting this Labour government's broken promises and pressing for action against the holocaust of vivisection - showed the depths to which the State and Establishment will sink when protecting vested interests. The longer Barry starved the greater the efforts to discredit him became.

Emphasise his conviction for arson - don't mention his voluntary work in animal sanctuaries. Claim he had no thought for how his family felt - ignore his deep concern for the lives of all individuals. Assert that some (including me!) considered him more use to the movement dead than alive - an allegation not worthy of a response. Barry, already weakened by hunger strikes lasting 35 and 46 days, spent 67 days taking nothing but water except for one weekend when fruit juice and similar liquids were available to help him concentrate on Home Office documents. The media, unable to believe that someone would hold out for so long in pursuit of a selfless cause, claimed he was secretly taking food and vitamins. The closer the time came to what appeared to be his imminent death the greater the media hysteria increased.

Make no mistake, Barry would not have been a martyr. He would have been a casualty. Yet another casualty of the corrupt, evil system that robs the life from countless millions of our brothers and sisters whose only 'crime' was to be born non-human - and too often also claims the lives of our fellow campaigners.

The final push in the attempts to discredit Barry and the animal liberation movement must surely have been the broadcast of 'Dispatches' ...

DIRTY TRICKS UNLIMITED

At 9.00 pm on Thursday 10th December last year Barry Horne was taken from York District Hospital on the short journey back to Full Sutton prison's medical wing, ostensibly to eke out his last few days of life. At the same moment Channel 4 television began screening 'Dispatches'. Of course, there is no suggestion of a conspiracy. The oddly dovetailed timings were pure chance, weren't they?

The programme tried to portray the animal liberation movement as a shadowy world inhabited by a mixture of social inadequates and dangerous, committed terrorists. I'll leave you to decide who was meant to fall into which category. Being a documentary it would have shown the truth, with a brave, crusading undercover reporter risking life and limb to reveal the hidden agenda of those who use animal welfare as a cover for their war against society. Strange that a Teletext poll not too long afterwards showed that 94% of respondents did not believe what they saw in TV documentaries ...

Graham Hall, the intrepid undercover investigator, has been found to have a history of portraying lies as truth, and imagination as fact. Although he has, in the past, investigated badger digging and dog fighting there are widespread allegations that he has been responsible for setting up scenes of animal cruelty. Perhaps he would like to counter these claims? For example, is it true that he orchestrated the television news item last year that showed a mink killing a kitten in someone's garden? Certainly it's true that he conned a respected animal rescue charity out of £10,000 ... and the charity hasn't even been able to persuade him to repay part of it from his ill-gotten gains courtesy 'Dispatches'.

This piece of television fantasy was broadcast at a time when Barry was thought to be entering his final hours. If the intention had just been to discredit the ALF press office, why wait so long? The most recent scenes from Hall's hidden camera that featured me were filmed more than ten months before Barry even began his third hunger strike. This programme was intended to discredit Barry, to discredit me, to discredit our compassionate movement and to turn public opinion against what everyone thought would culminate in the ultimate sacrifice by an animal liberation prisoner of conscience.

As Channel 4 haven't heard the last of this disgusting example of gutter journalism I won't offer a detailed explanation here. Suffice it to say that the programme tapes were requested by none other than the Hampshire Loonies (... sorry, police!). Do you really think I'd still be free to write this article, more than three months later, if what 'Dispatches' claimed to show was true? And mentioning the Hampshire Loonies leads me neatly to ...

AN END TO THE LUNACY AT LAST?

Yes, alright, I know you must all be completely fed up with Gandalf, Operation Washington, the Hampshire Loonies or whatever you want to call it. I know that I started writing about this when the Hampshire police first raided my home in August 1994 (the night before a rally in London by the National Anti-Hunt Campaign of which I was a part). I know it was later revealed in court that the Hampshire Loonies had been investigating me since 1992. But ... it just may be that the threat to freedom of speech and animal liberation is finally at an end ... or is that wishful thinking?

The trial commenced - yet again - on Monday 2nd November at Portsmouth Crown Court. Paul Rogers, general editor of Green Anarchist, and myself were supposed to have conspired over a 5-year period on the strength of three short telephone calls during 1994 relating to an event at which I was due to speak. Even more bizarre was the Prosecution's insistence that the three Green Anarchists who had been acquitted on appeal should be listed on our indictment as co-conspirators.

Why? Well, briefly, the Prosecution claimed that the Appeal Court had declared the original Gandalf trial null and void. Therefore, the trial had never - in law - taken place so there were no convictions to be quashed. As no court had ever declared the three "not guilty" then they could be named as allegedly conspiring with Paul and I. This contention was not supported by the Appeal Court's ruling lodged with Portsmouth Crown Court but the Prosecution argued, in effect, that "the wording of the ruling does not mean what the Appeal Court intended it to mean". Isn't it comforting to know that the Crown Prosecution Service doesn't believe the Appeal Court competent to explain itself clearly?

Adjourning for one week to obtain clarification of what the Appeal Court HAD meant to say we were then told it couldn't just tell us ... that would have been too simple. The matter would have to be decided at a reconvened hearing of the Appeal Court at the Royal Courts of Justice in London. So, yet another adjournment. With the Prosecution being responsible for so many delays and so much confusion over the years don't you think they would have made every effort to get it right this time? Read on ... dream on ...

The Appeal Court in its wisdom decreed on Thursday 19th November that the indictment at the original Gandalf trial had been faulty so the whole proceedings were therefore null and void. No one had been tried. No one had been convicted. No one had been acquitted. The 3-month trial was to be erased from memory.

When the Crown Court reconvened in Portsmouth the following Wednesday it looked game, set and match to the Prosecution. The three 'acquitted' Green Anarchists could be listed as co-conspirators, as I had been at their trial, without appearing in the dock. And then ... the Defence pointed out what neither the Appeal Court, nor the Judge, and certainly not the Prosecution, had thought of ... what had seemed to be the Prosecution's (sorry, Prosecution's) success became its downfall. The indictment at trial had been faulty so the same charges at committal were similarly faulty. If the Crown Court trial was null and void then the committal hearings were similarly null and void. Legally, none of us should be in court number one at Portsmouth Crown!

The judge agreed and at last brought the whole sorry mess to a conclusion. Did I miss out the phrase "final conclusion"? I'm afraid so ...

December came and we heard that the Prosecution had applied to the High Court for an obscure 'voluntary bill of indictment'. If granted, such a move would bypass arrest, bypass charging, bypass committal for trial and place us straight back in ... Portsmouth Crown Court. The irony of it all was that, as Paul and I were no longer facing charges, neither we nor our lawyers had any legal right to be heard. Our Defence teams could make written submissions to the court, the judges could then read what we had to say - if they felt like it - but they could then totally ignore it! Just think, our legal system is supposed to be the best in the world! At last, in mid-January, a ray of sanity ... the High Court threw out the Prosecution's application, effectively telling them "On yer bike!"

Hopefully, that will be an end to the Hampshire Lunacy once and for all. I've now had charges on the same evidence thrown out against me a record four times. British justice has triumphed at long last. Or has it? Watch this space ...

ARE WE SUPPOSED TO TAKE THEM SERIOUSLY?

Sow stalls have now been banned by law in the UK. Great ... excuse me if I seem to lack the expected burst of enthusiasm. Veal crates were banned in the UK some years ago. How many farms in Britain still used that system at the time? Was it four? Not enough for the government to worry about losing the farming vote but think how many animal welfare votes they hoped to gain by saying "After all your years of campaigning we have bowed to your demands. We have taken notice of you. Trust us. Vote for us."

In the wake of veal crates being banned more than one thousand calves every day were exported in terrible conditions. To endure a short, nightmare life in the very systems our wonderful government had outlawed. The same is now happening to our porcine cousins. Animal welfare laws are all too often callous, cruel and electioneering confidence tricks. Since the very first, in 1822, there has not been a single piece of legislation passed that had as its primary intention the wellbeing of individual animals.

The anti-vivisectionists call, quite rightly, for total abolition. The same must be true for those in farms, in circuses, in whaling ... for those oppressed anywhere by whatever means. Slavery is morally wrong. Had welfare been the driving force, we would still have slavery today, albeit perhaps a 'kinder' version. Abolition was the only answer to slavery. Abolition can be the only answer to animal abuse.

And then there are those being taught to help those of other species. What outlook do they have? How are their attitudes being formed? Recent instructions by Congregation Regent House at the University of Cambridge reveals the following code of attire for those following a veterinary career: "Academic Dress - Bachelor of Veterinary Medicine: similar to the hood for Bachelor of Medicine, but with more fur" ... next time you see your doctor, ask them if they wore bits of human skin draped around their heads when they graduated. As the old question goes "How many doctors do you know who eat their patients?"

DIRTY TRICKS - PART II

The very same day that Barry Horne was moved from York District Hospital to Full Sutton prison and Channel 4 screened 'Dispatches' there was a 2-page spread in the Daily Express featuring David Hammond's claims that I tried to involve him with sawn-off shotguns. Hammond will, no doubt, be familiar to most of you as the person who condemned the ALF and promoted his version of non-violent veganism while having as his mentor a meat-eating paid police informer ... also as the nasty piece of work who conned the Justice for Keith Mann Campaign out of thousands of pounds. By the way, Keith ... great news that you're out at last, shame it took so long!

The problem with Mr Hammond is that it's all in his imagination. The sad thing is that trying to set me up with people like Hammond seems all part of an ARNI campaign to discredit me ... or is that paranoia?

AND SO WE CONTINUE ...

The press office carries on despite the dirty tricks and police harassment, in fact the workload is growing to an international level. Sweden, Belgium, Canada, Finland, France and the USA are just some of the countries who have contacted this office for information. We even get requests - more often than you'd think! - on how to contact national organisations.

But, we can't do that without your help. Money is a dirty word but we can't function without it. The press office, to protect the ALF Supporters Group, is completely independent and doesn't get funding from anywhere except YOU! If you believe that a radical voice for animal liberation - and for those who risk their freedom - is important then please help us continue.

Meanwhile, the animals need to be free. It doesn't matter if you leaflet, lobby or liberate ... let's all work that little bit harder for our goal and all work together for their freedom. There's only one enemy and it's not each other, it's animal abuse. You want liberation. I want liberation. Most importantly, our brothers and sisters want liberation. Come on, don't just work for it ... let's achieve it.

Keeping Death off the Streets

At the beginning of March, activists from London Animal Action took to the streets of London and targeted fur wearers. About 15 protesters, followed by police officers, made their way around the West End and approached anyone wearing either fur coats, jackets, hats or trim. On several occasions, fur wearers had to be escorted by police to avoid being harangued. It became increasingly obvious as the day wore on that the tactic was a great success and that fur wearers were getting the message. On several occasions they actually turned around and walked in the opposite direction rather than face up to the truth that fur is not only unfashionable but a disgrace.

LAA would like to emphasise the importance of approaching fur wearers wherever they may be because by shaming them, they are less likely to wear fur garments. It is handy to carry anti-fur trade leaflets for those who prefer to avoid direct confrontation.

Fur-Free London Campaign plan to hold several more forays in London in the near future and anyone interested should contact them. For further information, leaflets, etc, please contact:

Campaigning for an end to animal experiments at Quintiles vivisection lab in Ledbury

Weekly Pickets

Pickets of the Ledbury laboratory continue to take place every Monday and Thursday from 4pm - 5:30pm to "greet" the lab workers as they leave for home. SQAT campaigners have now adopted the tactic of videoing the lab staff and their vehicles, much to the consternation of the lab workers and security guards, who have now begun to make their own videos of the protesters (for what little good that will do them). Despite the police presence, protesters are often able to surround vehicles leaving the lab and vociferously tell the occupants what they think of them, to such an extent that on March 22nd a van full of lab staff would not leave until the police arrived to escort it. The farmer who owns the fields surrounding the lab doesn't want to get involved in taking action against protesters who cross his land, which means that demonstrators are able to get right round the back of the laboratory and harangue those working inside, who frequently cower away from the verbal onslaught.

Global Week of Action

A Global Week of Action Against Quintiles' Animal Tests is to take place from June 21st - 26th. It is hoped that protests will be held during this week at many of the Quintiles offices and laboratories throughout the world. SQAT is in the process of contacting foreign animal rights activists to tell them about the week of action and give them details of Quintiles premises in their own countries.

Actions in this country will include the following:

Monday, June 21st :

Picket of Quintiles lab, Ledbury, 4pm - 5:30pm.

Tuesday, June 22nd :

Phone and fax blockade of Ledbury lab (phone 01531 634121, fax 01531 634753 and 01531 631554).

Wednesday, June 23rd :

Demo at Quintiles UK HQ, Bracknell, 1pm - 4pm (two locations - Station House (right next to Bracknell railway station) and Ringside, 79 High Street, Bracknell).

Thursday, June 24th :

Picket of Quintiles lab, Ledbury, 4pm - 5:30pm.

Friday, June 25th :

Phone and fax blockade of DHL couriers, to ask that they cease transporting materials to and from Quintiles lab (phone 0345 100300, fax 01332 816339).

Home Office Demo

On Thursday, July 15th SQAT is organising a demo outside the Home Office, 50 Queen Anne's Gate, London SW1 (just outside St. James's Park tube station), from 12 noon onwards. The demo will be demanding that Quintiles' licence to do animal experiments be withdrawn, but we would like all those involved in campaigns against other labs and breeding centres to come along with banners, placards, posters etc. to make it a large and visual protest against vivisection as a whole.

Esher House, Esher Green, Esher Surrey, KT10 8BT

Tel: 01372 461000. Fax: 01372 461078

As far as we are aware, animal experiments do not take place at the above locations, but the idea is to put pressure on all Quintiles premises to persuade the company to cease animal testing at Ledbury.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS

AUSTRALIA

Face branding of cattle has been outlawed in Queensland, Australia, following a two-year campaign by Animal liberation Queensland, the World league for the Protection of Animals, and other members of the Animals Australia coalition. Even the government's beef advisory council and the Australian Association of Cattle Veterinarians agreed the practice, which is done to preserve the value of the animal's hide, was inhumane. The win follows a similar 1997 victory in New South Wales.

On 25 May 1998, at Cairns Airport, 10 live, juvenile Green Tree Pythons were found concealed under the clothing of a passenger on a flight from Singapore. At Cairns Magistrates' Court the following day, two male Singapore nationals were charged with importation without a permit or authority in contravention of the Wildlife Protection (Regulation of Exports and Imports) Act and one was charged with animal cruelty. Chee Meng Chong and Sheu Yang Yap were later sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

CAMBODIA

Cambodia's outgoing minister of agriculture has called for a halt to illegal logging and ordered forestry officials to get tough in cracking down on increasingly uncontrolled exploitation of forests. Tao Seng Hour said increasing amounts of illegally felled timber were being brought out of the country's dwindling forests and it had to be stopped. Last year the International Monetary Fund indefinitely suspended support programs to Cambodia, largely because of wasteful logging practices. Environmentalists and some politicians say powerful military and business figures are behind the uncontrolled logging.

A November crackdown by Paris police on "pet" shops that display animals in cages along the sidewalk means that the hens, ducks, rabbits, cats, dogs, and other animals will no longer have to endure being kept outside with no protection from the elements. Animal protectionists had long charged that these shops, located in the city's well-known open-air market, are inhumane. Since there is little room to move the cages inside their small stores, shopkeepers claimed the restriction would probably force them to give up selling some kinds of creatures altogether. This may force them to lay off staff, even to close.

RUSSIA

The Cold War is over for Moscow's street 9 dogs now that sterilisation has replaced euthanasia as the method for controlling strays. Mayor Yuri Luzhkov instituted the new policy in response to Brigitte Bardot's condemnation of the city's plan to kill 25,000 homeless dogs. Instead, stray dogs will be spayed or neutered, fitted with microchips, and then released. A city official said the programme should reduce the number of stray dogs by 50 percent within three to four years and cost less to implement than killing the animals. 'No Brigitte Bardot's going to call Moscow's Mayor Luzhkov the dog-knacker any more,' read one newspaper. 'The era of the extermination of strays is over.'

In a major victory against the live animal trade, a South African judge issued an order permitting the National Council of Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (NSPCA) to seize 30 baby elephants who were taken from their herds in Botswana and exported to South Africa by animal dealer Riccardo Ghiazza. Ghiazza reportedly planned to sell the elephants for $25,000 each to parks and zoos in Germany, China, Switzerland, and possibly the United States. Instead, the NSPCA will transport them to a park or ranch outside Pretoria for holding and veterinary care until an attempt can be made to reunite them with their families.

TAHITI

Life's no longer a beach for a colony of cats living on a tiny, deserted island near a Club Med resort in Tahiti. While on vacation, Mary Hackshaw of New Zealand discovered the emaciated, sickly cats whom Club Med employees had been dumping there without food or water. Hackshaw started a letter-writing campaign to the resort chain's headquarters, which ultimately led to the company enlisting the help of the World Society for the Protection of Animals, Fenua Animalia (a Tahitian group), local veterinarians, and even 'other hotels and the Tahitian government,' according to a Club Med spokesperson. The cats will be removed from the island and spayed or neutered.

Bert and Ernie, two pigs used in non-invasive studies at Penn State University, have been retired to PIGS, a sanctuary in West Virginia. As a way to study the intelligence of pigs, the animals - made famous by high-profile news stories - learned to play computer games (by using a joystick) and even how to adjust the thermostat in their room. PIGS director Dale Riffle praised the university's 'humane gesture' and felt the move set a precedent for other animals used in research, which he hoped would be retired to appropriate and qualified sanctuaries instead of being sent to slaughter and/or destroyed.

Acknowledging the link between animal cruelty and human violence, a judge in Cameron County, Texas, handed down an unprecedented sentence for three men convicted of stoning a stray dog to death. Adrian Adame, 17, Juan Garcia, 21, and Geraldo Zamora, 20, were each given 30 days in jail, followed by six months in a "recovery centre". The sentence also included two years probation, 100 hours of community service, mandatory counselling and other stipulations. Denise Porter, an animal activist involved in mobilising others to call for the stiffest penalty possible, called the sentence "much more than has ever been seen before in south Texas."

The curtain fell on Bobby Berosini's orang-utan act at the Tropicana Hotel in Las Vegas after People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) alerted the hotel's management about the entertainer's history of animal abuse. Berosini, who had been caught on videotape in 1989 beating orang-utans in his care, had recently started using the endangered primates in photo sessions in the Tropicana's lobby. The group had planned to picket the hotel but cancelled the protest once the Tropicana announced the immediate cancellation of Berosini's act. PETA has filed for custody of the orang-utans with the Nevada State Supreme Court.

Illinois Animal Action succeeded in convincing the organisers of the Taste of Glen Ellyn that including elephant rides in the town event was in poor taste. The rides were cancelled after the group fired off protest letters to the organisers, informed the police about the dangers to the public, garnered local headlines, and marshalled elephant advocates via action alerts.

Fast-food chain McDonald's started offering meatless burgers last summer at outlets in New York City, and according to Farm Sanctuary, the vegetarian option is being met with 'rave reviews.'

In Massachusetts, animal advocates are cheering the passage of a new law that makes highways less hazardous for animals by requiring that they be safely restrained in order to travel in the back of a pickup truck. Because the law primarily targets drivers who allow their dogs to ride loose in the bed of the truck, more canines are sure to be seen riding shotgun now.

Prairie dogs in much of South Dakota's Buffalo Gap National Grasslands are no longer under siege from "varmint" hunters since the U.S. Forest Service, which manages the area, issued a cease-fire. The agency's decision followed a public outcry over the slaughter of thousands of prairie dogs on lands that are also home to the black-footed ferret and burrowing owl-both federally protected species. Although not every area is closed to prairie dog killing, most of the colonies are located in the regions where hunting was stopped. Meanwhile, the Forest Service continues to monitor the effects of shooting to determine if it should be banned throughout the park.

No longer will the circus be coming to town in Azusa, California, after the city council voted to drop a Circus Vargus performance as its annual fundraising event. The decision to go with non-animal acts in the future marked the culmination of three years of opposition spearheaded by local activist Lucy Shelton. In Agawam, Massachusetts, New England Animal Action (NEAA) also met with success in making sure the Classic Circus Review would not be asked back for a repeat performance at the Riverside Theme Park. While the group protested outside the venue, NEAA President Peter Teraspulsy met with Riverside's marketing director, who assured him the park would not host the circus again. And in Wallkill, New York, animal acts suffered a near-fatal blow with the passage of a town ordinance banning physical contact between the public and large, exotic cats and bears. Yet the ban left out contact with elephants, a provision that Recognition of Animal Rights had pushed for, but the town board indicated it would consider adding other animals in the future.

A former veterinarian with the Salk Institute won a $4.7 million lawsuit after claiming she was fired for reporting animal abuse. Teresa Sylvina was hired by the research laboratory in 1990 to correct deficiencies in animal care. She claims she was fired in 1996 after exposing continued problems, and also reported sexual harassment and defamation. The Salk Institute denies the charges and is appealing the ruling, but is reportedly under investigation by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the National Institutes of Health.

Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus will pay $20,000 to support elephant disease research and an elephant sanctuary as part of a "consent decision" with the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA). The agency had investigated Ringling Bros. for violations of the Animal Welfare Act after the death of a baby elephant in January last year. Although the circus neither admits nor denies any wrongdoing, the incident marks the first time that Ringling Bros. has paid a financial settlement related to violations of the Act.

The sheriff of Guilford County, North Carolina, earned nationwide attention for unwanted animals when he televised the killing of a dog on his local "Sheriff's Beat" programme. After learning that 10,000 of the 13,000 animals brought to the county shelter were euthanized last year, Sheriff BJ Barnes chose this method of public education "out of frustration. The only thing I wanted to do was let people in Guilford County know they've got to do better." The former Marine devotes his weekly television show to a different topic each month, and chose August to promote spaying and neutering. His approach seems to have hit a nerve; as the morning after the first part of the programme was broadcast, people lined up at the shelter before it opened, and adoptions increased 300 percent.

A New York man filed a $30 million lawsuit against Wendy's for not disclosing that the dressing used in its vegetable pita sandwiches contained gelatine. Patrick Fish says the company engaged in false advertising and infringed on his religious civil rights as an ethical vegetarian when a Wendy's employee erroneously told him that his sandwich did not contain animal products. Wendy's spokesman Denny Lynch had no comment on the lawsuit, but claimed that because of complaints from vegetarians, the sauce is no longer made with gelatine.

A major Chicago retailer has been dealt a blow by the Canadian government. Evans Furs, recognised as North America's largest fur company, has lost its insurability under Canada's Export Development Program. This means that fur wholesalers will not be insured against losses that could arise if Evans were to declare bankruptcy. The weak retail fur market caused the Canadian government to lose confidence in Evans Furs. This news came just as Evans was announcing a loss of nearly $3 million dollars for the second quarter of their fiscal year. Earlier last year Andriana Furs, another prominent Chicago retailer, filed for bankruptcy protection. Andriana had to close 2 of their 3 Chicago area stores and has yet to emerge from financial turmoil.

FMC Corp. has agreed to pay more than $170 million, including a record penalty, to settle charges it repeatedly violated the hazardous waste law at its phosphorus production facility in Pocatello, Idaho. The U.S. Justice Department and the Environmental Protection Agency said the settlement included an $11.8 million civil penalty, the largest under the federal resource conservation and recovery law. The government charged FMC, which makes chemicals and machinery, with placing hazardous phosphorus wastes in ponds, posing a potential threat to human life and the environment.

The federal government is to join forces with Oregon in a new $250 million project to protect state streams that are home to endangered species of salmon and trout. U.S.

Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman and Oregon Gov. John Kitzhaber have announced an agreement to restore as many as 100,000 acres of environmentally sensitive land along 4,000 miles of the state's streams. The agreement creates the Oregon Conservation Reserve Enhancement Program, which will pay farmers an annual rental to take crop land along stream and river banks out of production and plant it with trees and grasses to reduce runoff.

The federal government is also to protect streams in Washington state that are home to endangered species of salmon under the same project. As many as 100,000 acres of environmentally sensitive land along 3,000 miles of Washington's streams will be protected under the new programme. The government will pay for about 80% of the $250 million cost of the programme over the next 15 years. The state and private landowners will pay the rest. The agreement creates the Washington Conservation Reserve Enhancement Program, which gives farmers an annual rent to take crop land out of production and plant it with trees and grasses to reduce runoff.

California has moved to cancel the logging license for Pacific Lumber, the company at the centre of a battle over the future of the state's dwindling ancient redwood groves. The state Department of Forestry and Fire Protection said Pacific Lumber must halt all logging activities covered by its licence because of "continued violations of the state's forest practice rules." The termination order followed a series of fresh charges against Pacific Lumber, which won a conditional licence last year to log its 200,000 acres of forest after officials promised to stop practices that led to several environmental violations.

In Oregon, the Junction City Council has replaced a year-old ban on feeding feral cats with a more humane programme of spaying and neutering. The ban, imposed after business leaders complained about the exploding cat population, had gone mostly unnoticed until 65-year-old Juliana Keiser deliberately defied the law by feeding cats in a downtown alley. After animal protection campaigners packed the courtroom and picketed City Hall, council members lifted the ban and authorised a group of them to trap the cats and have them inoculated, spayed or neutered, and then released. Under the new programme, the cats will be fed regularly.

In October, New York's Court of Appeals overturned a lower court's decision by ruling that the State University of New York (SUNY) cannot withhold information about its source of dogs and cats used in experiments. SUNY officials fought against releasing the records in order to keep the identities of animal researchers secret from animal rights groups. Citizens for Alternatives to Animal Labs (CAAL) had sued the SUNY Health Science Centre in Brooklyn after several companion animals in the area were reported to have disappeared. Although there has been no evidence that SUNY obtained stolen 'pets,' CAAL intends to be sure by accessing the university's records. 'If there is pet theft, we're going to find out about it,' said CAAL's attorney, Elinor Molbegott.

A Dallas gun club has been barred from holding pigeon shoots as a result of legal action taken by animal activists. In October, State District Judge John Marshall made permanent a temporary restraining order that was filed by the Flower Mound Humane Society and the Carrollton Nature Coalition to stop the club's shoot in August. Judge Marshall cited the club's violations of state anti-cruelty statutes, such as small cages, feed contaminated with droppings, and the way wounded birds were killed by having their heads torn off as the basis for the permanent injunction. Commenting on how the birds were kept, the judge said, 'if it were humans, it would be outrageous. It's no less outrageous for animals.' Although the club (which has held such shoots for decades) may appeal the decision, the ruling has already prevented thousands of pigeons from being killed. This is the first time that a permanent injunction has been implemented for the sake of pigeons that we know of," stated Lydia Nichols of Animal liberation of Texas.

In September, housing officials in Westhaven, Connecticut, promised to stop the trapping of skunks near an apartment complex, following an outcry from animal advocates over a skunk caught in a box trap who was burned to death. After a showdown between animal rights supporters and members of the pork industry, 167 abandoned pigs have found permanent sanctuary from slaughter. The pigs were being transported from a factory farm in North Carolina to a Pennsylvania slaughterhouse when the driver abandoned the trailer on a Washington, D.C., street, leaving the animals in the hot sun without water or basic care. Local residents notified the police and the Washington Humane Society, which seized the trailer. The pigs were towed to the Poplar Spring Animal Sanctuary in Maryland, where animal activists worked tirelessly throughout the night to remove the terrified animals from the trailer. The next day, agents from the Hanor pork company and their legal counsel arrived at Poplar Springs with local police to retrieve the pigs. Hanor's representatives were asked to provide a cash payment of more than $10,000 to cover the costs associated with caring for the animals and in lieu of making the payment Hanor agreed to sign the pigs over to the sanctuary.

Authorities have decided not to bring criminal charges against the Hanor Company for abandoning the pigs, although the truck driver may face animal cruelty charges. Hanor's biggest penalty was the loss of the approximately $14,000 market value of the pigs.

Shock Dog Collars Banned

On the 13th March it was reported in the Daily Mirror that a police force had banned the use of electrical collars to train dogs. After the paper revealed that animal welfare experts had condemned the Home Office-approved collars that give dogs a small shock, Humberside Police said it was suspending their use. A survey revealed that eleven forces use either the electrical collars or ones that force steel barbs into dogs' necks. Home Secretary Jack Straw is under pressure to outlaw both.

Humberside assistant Chief Constable Gordon Clark said: "In the light of public concern over the training of dogs, Humberside Police has decided to conduct a review." A police insider welcomed the news. He said, "I have seen shocks from these collars lift the dog upright onto its back feet." The National Canine Defence League praised the decision. It said: "Training should be based on praise and reward."

THE CYCLE OF VIOLENCE TO CHILDREN AND ANIMALS & THE CYCLE OF ABUSE

Compiled by Robin Lane

THE CYCLE OF VIOLENCE

Children learn from adult role models and the society they live in. A home of violence, abuse, or neglect produces children who may pass these behaviours on to the next generation, and so on.

Animals, especially pets, get caught up in this cycle of family violence:

- ◆ Women and children are sometimes intimidated into silence about sexual or other abuses through threats made toward a favourite pet
- ◆ Pets are sometimes hurt or killed to punish children for something they have done
- ◆ Abused children may act out aggression and frustration on a pet they perceive as even more vulnerable than themselves
- ◆ Physically or sexually abused children may kill their pets rather than have them hurt by the adult abuser in the home

In most cases, the animal is the last victim in a chain of abuse that filters down from the strongest family member to the weakest.

HOW DOES ANIMAL ABUSE AFFECT YOU?

Violence towards animals springs from the same causes as violence towards humans. No longer can cruelty to animals be passed off as just a phase in childhood.

Research indicates:

- ◆ Young people who are cruel to animals are more likely to become aggressive toward humans as they develop
- ◆ Violent, imprisoned offenders have usually abused animals during their childhood
- ◆ Children raised with intense coercion may imitate this behaviour with animals and people
- ◆ Children learn cruel behaviours from adults and may re-enact them on animals.
- ◆ Children abuse animals to release the aggression they feel toward abusive adults or because of psychological trauma.

DOES CRUELTY TO ANIMALS LEAD TO CRUELTY TO PEOPLE?

Research shows a strong correlation between substantial animal abuse in childhood and later personal violence to humans. This research should alert parents, social leaders, lawyers, and judges to the importance of animal cruelty as a potential indicator of disturbed family relationships and future aggressive behaviour towards humans.

- ◆ In a study of 57 families being treated for incidents of child abuse, 88% also abused animals. In two-thirds of the cases, it was the abusive parent who had killed or injured animals to control a child. In one-third, the children had abused the animals, using them as scapegoats for their anger.
- ◆ In a study of imprisoned sexual-murderers (all men), researchers found that 36% had abused animals in their childhood and 46% in adolescence.
- ◆ In a study using a sample of 64 men, 48% of convicted rapists and 30% of convicted child molesters admitted to cruelty to animals during their childhood or adolescence.

Dogs are the most common target of abuse, and when combined with cats, these domestic animals composed the vast majority of victims. Almost all of these animals are owned and females are the majority of complainants. Those suspected of abusing animals are almost always young males, and most of the time they allegedly shot, beat, stabbed, or threw their victims. Reportedly, adults were more likely than children to abuse dogs, and to abuse them alone rather than within a group. Young offenders were more likely to abuse cats, and to beat them while an adult is present.

WHAT CAN WE DO?

We can report animal and child abuse whenever we become aware of it.

We can also encourage others to become familiar with the link between cruelty to animals and family violence and to support organisations that protect animals and children such as the American Humane Association.

THE CYCLE OF ABUSE

Humans objectify animals due to their different body forms and different abilities (thus equating them to the body) and label them as "others". Since they lie in the "others" category, people feel they can use them instrumentally as beauty possessions (fur coats, leather belts, cosmetic products), forms of entertainment (carnivals, rodeos, horse racing, zoos, hunting, and tools of education (victims of dissection and vivisection research). To continue the cycle, they are fragmented: called spare ribs, pork chops, breasts, wings and then end the cycle by literally consuming them.

Thought provoking statistics were published in an "Animal People" newsletter. A study was carried out in Toledo, Ohio, which found that the number of hunters in a country more accurately predicts the level of abuses of physical violence, neglect, sexual and child abuse than either the population density or median income. One possible explanation for this association is offered: that hunting or learning to hunt may somehow produce abusive personalities. Dominionism is the common link between hunting and child/women abuse. Thus, the incidents of these forms of abuse are found to increase with the percentage of dominionistic men (in the hunting population).

Such a clear connection may unfortunately not be this simple. Nevertheless, a link exists between the treatment of women/minorities and the treatment of non-human animals. The mind which tends to objectify "others" (whether a person of different colour, different sex, different sexual orientation or different species) is one step closer to fragmenting these populations in order to "use" them for personal benefit or to ultimately consume them.

Buddhism and Animals

A New Book

The first book of its kind, Buddhism and Animals is a profound and stimulating exploration of the congruence between the teachings of the Buddha (in both the Pali and Mahayana Scriptures) and the tenets of Animal Rights.

Readable, informative and thoroughly referenced, Buddhism and Animals presents a compelling Buddhist vision of the sacredness of all life and the consequent need for a lifestyle embracing veganism and one opposed to hunting and vivisection.

Serious Buddhist scholars have praised the author Dr. Tony Page's analysis of a highly topical subject. With the recent steady growth of both the Buddhist and the Animal Rights Movements, Dr. Page's book is timely and well worth

SEXCRIME

THE LINK BETWEEN THE EXPLOITATION OF WOMEN AND THE EXPLOITATION OF ANIMALS

The connection between the treatment of women and the treatment of animals is evident in pornography. For example, it is often the case for batterers/rapists to force sex between animals and their female victim. Often men who have been prosecuted for sex crimes will have started their abuse in acts of torturing animals. In pornography, women will be depicted in animalistic/submissive positions (doggy style), having chains, collars, whips, cattle prods, hooks, etc. used on them. They may be held by a leash and raped from behind.

BESTIALITY

A similar connection is seen with the male fascination with bestiality. An underworld exists within the sex industry where animals are forced to have sex with women and where men have sex with animals. A world where women are raped by animals and animals are raped by men. The animals used in this way are usually dogs, horses and sheep but almost all animals are abused including snakes, pigs, hens and even fish.

Our culture is intrigued with domination and control as seen through our high incidence of animal exploitation, rape, child abuse and murder.

supporting. It is vital that Buddhists be encouraged to support the Animal Rights philosophy of their Founder and thus add their voice to the growing number of compassionate people who wish to see an end to all animal exploitation and abuse.

Beauty Without Cruelty (India), was established in Pune on 12th September 1974. BWC Centres now operate in Bangalore, Calcutta, Mumbai, New Delhi and Varanasi.

With specific goals in mind BWC has sincerely carried out its work while keeping a low profile. Most tasks undertaken have been difficult, often seemingly impossible to achieve but frustration has never made them give up. Sticking to facts, a persistent follow-up and constantly looking for new ways to achieve their aims have led to success in many instances. The organisation produce a very informative magazine "The Compassionate Friend" which highlights the cruelty against animals and how people can help to stop it. A 20 minute film has been produced on 35mm, 16mm and video so that people can be made aware of the suffering and death inflicted upon animals for the luxury trades in India. The video cassette is available in both Hindi and English and contains two other films entitled "What price beauty" and "Ivory Poachers".

Some Successes

● In spite of legislation against the use of live bait, BWC found that the Government was using live bait as prey for carnivorous animals. On several occasions a strong protest was lodged, resulting in an assurance given that the practice of using live bait would be discontinued.

● BWC persuaded the Government to ban the use of live hare coursing in Punjab.

● A persistent follow-up by BWC resulted in revealing the illegality of the Elephant Show (a circus within a sanctuary) at Mudumalai, and in 1998 the Government ordered it to be immediately stopped.

● BWC was one of the first organisations which during the 1980s seriously took up the issue of dissection in educational institutions. Finally, in response to a petition supported by BWC and other organisations, a Delhi High Court judgement received in May 1997 ruled that school students have a right of choice whether or not to dissect living creatures.

● For the first time ever in order to bring down the demand for animal products and not put seized wildlife items back into circulation, BWC in collaboration with the Chief Wildlife Warden, Delhi and the Government of India organised a bonfire in 1991 when goods worth Rs. 7,000,000/- were destroyed.

● In 1994, BWC convinced the Central Board of Film Certification to censor certain parts of the film Betaaj Badshah in which the mouth of a leopard had been stitched up for a performance.

● BWC has, at present, 6,500 members and would like to hear from anyone who would like to join in their campaign. They provide their magazine free of charge but would appreciate donations to cover postal costs (particularly from outside of India).

cruelty-free footwear and accessories

A Brief History

In 1835, the British Parliament outlawed bull baiting, a sadistic gambling game in which bulldogs were used to attack and harass bulls brought to market with the dubious intention of tenderising the flesh. The dog would assault the bull, avoid the stomping hooves and slashing horns, grab a tender nose or ear, and hang on until the bull collapsed. The public and royalty alike attended these bloody spectacles until an outcry forced Parliament to take a stand.

Once bull baiting was banned, dogs were bred especially for fighting. Dog breeders began with the bulldog, mixed in some terrier blood and produced the Bull and Terrier, a dog that met all of their expectations; the Bull and Terrier was bred for aggression to other dogs.

What is Dog Fighting?

Dogfighting is a sadistic 'contest' in which two dogs, specifically bred and trained to fight, are placed in a pit (generally an area enclosed by plywood walls) for the purpose of attacking and mauling each other to earn money for their owners and entertain spectators. Fights average nearly an hour in length and often last more than two hours. Dogfights end when one of the dogs is no longer able or willing to continue.

The injuries inflicted and sustained by dogs in dogfights are frequently severe, even fatal. The American pit bull terriers, commonly used for fighting, have extremely powerful jaw muscles and are able to take hold with their front teeth while chewing away with their rear teeth. This produces severe bruising, deep puncture wounds, and broken bones. Dogs who survive a fight often die of blood loss, shock, dehydration, exhaustion or infection hours or even days after the fight.

Other animals are often sacrificed as well. Owners often train their dogs for fights using smaller animals such as cats, rabbits, or small dogs. These 'bait' animals are often stolen pets or animals obtained through 'free to good home' advertisements.

Dog Fighting

Other Concerns

The numerous raids carried out against dogfighting have unearthed many disturbing facets of this illegal 'sport'. Young children are often allowed or forced to watch, which promotes an insensitivity to animal cruelty, and an enthusiasm for violence. In the US, firearms and other weapons are quite common at dogfights because of the large amounts of money present. The fact that the dogs used have been bred for many generations to be dangerously aggressive causes concern for the safety of children and companion animals.

Help Prevent Dogfighting

In the USA, The HSUS are encouraging the Government and law enforcers around the country to make both dogfighting and spectating an illegal act. Since 1975 forty-three states have made dogfighting a felony offence. Whilst dogfighting is illegal in the UK it still takes place. If you know of dogfighting taking place then report it immediately.

Animal rights campaigners are celebrating after Railtrack agreed to a moratorium on the shooting and poisoning of pigeons at 14 main-line London train stations.

The National Anti-Hunt Campaign and the Pigeon Control Advisory Service (PICAS) have been jointly lobbying the company after the NAHC received a tip off about alleged imminent plans to shoot pigeons at London's Victoria Station.

Culling, in the form of poisoning and, most recently shooting, has taken place every six to twelve months at the station, according to Railtrack spokesman Kevin Grobes, although he later claimed at a meeting with a PICAS representative that the last shoot was three years ago. Campaigners argued that the fact that Railtrack still considered pigeon numbers to be a problem after years of lethal culling - Railtrack claims it receives ten complaints a week from customers - illustrates the abject failure of such techniques.

"We have tried other techniques including netting and wooden owls, but they have not been effective", claimed Mr Grobes, but NAHC spokesman Peter Ward believes that such alternatives represent just a tiny proportion of the "vast and flexible" range of humane measures now available. "Scientific studies have proved lethal culling does not provide a long-term reduction in bird numbers and indeed may, by rejuvenating the flock, even lead to an increase in numbers. Numerous local authorities and other bodies have recently abandoned the use of lethal culling techniques after considering this evidence and the range of more humane control techniques which now exist."

The NAHC alerted Britain's leading specialist in the field of pigeon control, Guy Merchant of PICAS, who held a lengthy meeting with Railtrack representatives and outlined alternatives available to them. The most suitable technique in this situation, he suggests, is to fly a specially trained bird of prey in the station to deter pigeons from the area. "We are not talking about falconry here", emphasises Mr Merchant. "Falconry is a despicable bloodsport and neither we nor the NAHC would ever condone its use. The companies we recommend use birds which have been carefully trained not to attack the pigeons." The pigeons, of course, don't know this and soon learn that there are far safer places to roost and feed.

Railtrack bosses, say Mr Merchant, were impressed. "Pigeons can be a pain and it is understandable that they want to minimise inconvenience to the public," he acknowledged. "The trouble is that many people assume the only way to reduce numbers is to kill them. This argument may sound logical but it is in fact simplistic and scientific evidence has demonstrated that it is entirely false. Many companies and councils have culled for years and found that numbers have not decreased but have then solved the problem by switching to alternative methods."

Two weeks after the NAHC had first become aware of plans to cull, Railtrack's Marketing Manager Craig

PIGEONS SAVED IN CULL MORATORIUM

The National Anti-Hunt Campaign

Donohue announced to Guy Merchant that the company would try humane alternatives. "I would be willing to commit that no culling of pigeons would take place whilst we are working to provide suitable alternatives", he pledged, adding that "subject to tolerable levels of nuisance being achieved, we would accept as policy within Railtrack Major Stations that we will only use humane methods." Such a policy would be recommended "as best policy throughout Railtrack."

Mr Ward said that both organisations were delighted with the outcome and were confident that, once Railtrack had tried alternative methods, they would never need to cull again. "Rail stations are the biggest killers of pigeons in Britain," he said, "so the significance of this decision should not be underestimated. We congratulate Railtrack on its compassionate stance and call on other private and public bodies to follow suit."

McLIBEL APPEAL - MORE McAGONY

Further defendants' victories on McDonald's nutrition and employment practices

FOR THE FAST FOOD GIANT

The verdict for the McLibel Appeal was handed down on Wednesday 31st March, in Court 1 at the Royal Courts of Justice, The Strand. There was a lively celebration picket by supporters outside the Court.

In their verdict, Lord Justices Pill, May and Keane added to the damning findings of fact made by the original trial judge, Mr Justice Bell, against McDonald's core business practices. They ruled that: it was fair comment to say that McDonald's employees worldwide 'do badly in terms of pay and conditions' [Appeal Judgment p247], and true that 'if one eats enough McDonald's food, one's diet may well become high in fat, etc., with the very real risk of heart disease.' The Lord Justices went on to state that this last finding 'must have a serious effect on their trading reputation since it goes to the very business in which they are engaged. In our judgment, it must have a greater impact on the respondents' [McDonald's] reputation than any other of the charges that the trial judge had found to be true'. [Judgment p264]

On June 19th 1997, after a 314-day trial - the longest in English history - in which the defendants had been denied Legal Aid and their right to a jury trial - Mr Justice Bell had ruled that "various of McDonald's advertisements, promotions and booklets have pretended to have a positive nutritional benefit which their food (high in fat & salt etc) did not match"; that McDonald's "exploit children" with their advertising strategy, are "culpably responsible for animal cruelty" and "pay low wages, helping to depress wages in the catering trade." Significantly McDonald's did not appeal over these damning rulings against them, stating that the Judge was 'correct in his conclusions' [McDonald's written submissions 5.1.99].

The Appeal Court also stated that it had 'considerable sympathy' with the defendants' submissions that the leaflet meant 'that there is a respectable (not cranky) body of medical opinion which links a junk food diet with a risk of cancer and heart disease', that 'this link was accepted both in literature published by McDonald's themselves and by one or more of McDonald's own experts and in medical publications of high repute', and that therefore 'that should have been an end of this part of the case' [p169]. However they ruled that their hands were tied by a procedural technicality so the appeal didn't succeed regarding the 'cancer' issue. [p170-2].

As a result of their further findings against the Corporation, the three Lord Justices reduced Mr Justice Bell's award of £60,000 damages to McDonald's (who'd spent an estimated £10m on the case) by £20,000. However, it is an outrage that McDonald's has been awarded any damages at all in the light of all the serious findings made against the company. No sanctions have been taken against the company, despite these findings.

Despite strong arguments by the Defendants, the Court of Appeal has failed to provide any real protection for the public's right to scrutinise and criticise companies whose business practices may affect people's lives, health and environment. The court ruled out the submission by the McLibel 2 that multinational corporations should no longer be able to sue for libel over public interest issues, stating that although 'that may be seen as an argument of some substance' they rejected it [p287]. Their view was that it was a matter for parliament, and 'a course which is not open to us' [p23]. Helen and Dave intend to appeal over these and other points to the House of Lords, and then take the UK Government to the European Court of Human Rights if necessary.

The Appeal began on 12th January 1999 and lasted 23 days in court, ending on 26th February. Helen Steel (33) and Dave Morris (45), representing themselves, challenged the use of libel laws as a form of mass censorship, and argued for the overturning of the parts of the original verdict which went against them in the controversial case brought by the McDonald's Corporation.

Channel 4 news said at the end of the original trial that the case would go down as 'the biggest Corporate PR disaster in history'. McDonald's aim of suppressing the 'What's Wrong With McDonald's?' leaflets has spectacularly backfired, with over 3 million handed out in the UK alone since the writs were served, 400,000 in the weekend after the verdict - and they are now being distributed worldwide. The 'McSpotlight' website containing over 20,000 files about McDonald's & McLibel has been accessed over 65 million times.

The Plight of the Chinchilla

Chinchillas, which are from South America, look like a rabbit/squirrel cross with deep fur and a long tail. Native to the rocky Andes, they were mass slaughtered for fur in the 1800s and then domesticated and farmed in the 1900s. Today in the wild they are on the brink of extinction. Chinchillas are now farmed intensively for both fur and pet trades. At present there are no appropriate laws to protect them. British units hold up to 400 animals, producing 600 offspring yearly. It takes 150 Chinchillas to make one full length coat.

Commercially, deprived of nest boxes, gnawing material and exercise, females are kept in rows of barren metal cells 1 foot square, stacked up to 3 cages high. Prevented from leaving by permanent neck collars, breeding stock can spend 15 years or more incarcerated in these tiny spaces (only a couple of times their own length), until, when finally worn out from numerous pregnancies, their necks will be broken and their place taken by the next victim in this miserable mass production system. Most males, and surplus females, will be killed for fur at about eight months old. Inferior animals are sold to pet shops who, knowing little about their very specialised needs, pass them on to equally ignorant owners. Poor breeding practices have also contributed to a now widespread malocclusion problem, which is when grotesquely overgrown teeth piece eye sockets, cheeks and jaws. Sadly there is unheeded suffering in all directions for the little publicised Chinchilla.

Chin Up Sanctuary

Lee Campbell, who runs Chin Up Sanctuary, started out as an ordinary pet owner. Innocently searching for information on her Chinchilla, she found herself suddenly in touch with the money motivated world of polygamous breeding units. Totally horrified by what she saw and unable to turn away she vowed to campaign for public awareness of the Chinchillas plight. In 1991, Chin Up was founded. The sanctuary takes in sick, abused or unwanted Chinchillas, plus legally rescued animals from the polygamous units Lee would like to see outlawed. It also campaigns through the media, welfare groups and leaflets, on behalf of the animals it can't personally help.

How you can help

To care for present and future rescues, and to achieve its aims, Chin Up desperately needs your help. Donations are needed for feeding, housing and veterinary care and are always very gratefully received.

Another way that you can help is by writing to your MP and newspapers decrying the Chinchillas' plight and to send for a petition form against polygamous breeding.

Horse & Pony Sanctuary

We have for some time been working to improve the lot of some forgotten working animals in Britain. We thought we were slowly moving along with our campaign. However, we seem to have hit a brick wall. The last few remaining Pit Ponies still toil daily in Wales with no sign of ever stopping. In fact recently a new owner of an old colliery workings with a long history of working horses, who wants to open new workings into large coal reserves, told me of his plans to start to use two Pit Ponies underground in his expanding colliery. It will be the new century shortly and yet ponies are still working in coal mines. We recently handed in a petition to 10 Downing Street with 44,000 signatures calling for an end to this practice. The Government's response has not been encouraging.

Please help us to outlaw the use of Pit Ponies by writing to the Home Office and the media. If you need further information, feel free to contact us.

Our sanctuary provides tender loving care to needy horses and ponies. To raise much needed funds we have merchandise available and welcome donations of used stamps (picture and foreign stamps in particular), ink jet cartridges, spare change, and bric a brac (especially ornaments, china, etc). Voluntary help is greatly appreciated.

YOU BET THEY DIE

Support the campaign against greyhound racing!

Every year in Britain and Ireland 30,000 greyhounds enter racing and 30,000 others end their racing lives.

The 30,000 greyhounds that are surplus to the racing industry are more likely to end their days, not in front of a warm fire, but drowned, poisoned, beaten to death, starved, dumped on the streets or impounded and destroyed.

Greyhound puppies are killed if they fail to reach racing standard. Around two thirds are deemed fit, while the other third will put to death before they reach a year old.

10,000 of the 20,000 Irish greyhounds who make the grade each year are exported to race on British tracks, where Irish bred greyhounds make up 75% of the total greyhound population.

Substantial numbers of greyhounds are exported to Spain for exhibition racing. Conditions in some Spanish kennels are appalling and many greyhounds are locked up 23 hours a day.

In the Spanish region of Andalusia many greyhounds from Britain and Ireland end up being used by local people for hunting and coursing. A considerable number of these greyhounds do not have the stamina for this and many are killed by being hanged by the neck in trees as a cheap method of disposal. Some have also been found burned and skinned.

The natural life-span of a greyhound is about 14 years, but the lives of most of those in racing end at 2 years old. Most greyhound owners and trainers, who are in the business to make a profit, are not prepared to pay the costs of allowing greyhounds to live out their natural lives. Many are not even prepared to pay the price of having the dogs humanely put to sleep by a vet.

Ex-racing greyhounds are used in cruel experiments, both in this country and abroad. In 1994 there were 12 painful experiments using greyhounds in British laboratories.

GREYHOUND ACTION

Greyhound Action was formed in 1997 with the ultimate aim of putting an end to greyhound racing. There are several other groups which are dedicated to finding homes for ex-racing greyhounds, but in practical terms it is only possible to re-home a very small percentage of the vast number of greyhounds disposed of every year by the greyhound racing industry. Therefore the total abolition of greyhound racing is the only real solution.

Greyhound Action is seeking to educate the public about the dark side of greyhound racing, so that support for this so-called "sport" withers away. We are also attempting to put pressure on the government to ban greyhound racing altogether. We know it will take a long battle to achieve such a ban, but it is not an impossible aim, as greyhound racing has been abolished in 6 states in the USA since 1993. As part of our campaign a petition calling for a ban on greyhound racing has been produced, as well as leaflets, factsheets, posters, badges and stickers.

GREYHOUND AWARENESS WEEK

From the 22nd to 29th of May, Greyhound Action will be staging another Greyhound Awareness

Week with the aim of educating the public not to support greyhound racing. Many local animal protection groups and concerned individuals will be taking part in this by doing street stalls, writing letters to newspapers and doing interviews in the local media. Leaflets will also be distributed to those attending greyhound races and betting shops.

Our first Greyhound Awareness Week, last May, was very successful with at least 20 local animal protection groups taking part in different areas of the country. This year we intend to make it an international event, with groups from other European countries, the USA etc. also getting involved.

A NEW WORLD ORDER

The present money dominated, profit motivated, competitive civilisation spreading fast throughout the world is not sustainable; it is disrupting the life support systems of the planet. It is damaging the soil and jeopardising water supplies. It is polluting the air, the water, the soil. It is causing global warming that could have a variety of disastrous effects. It is causing holes in the stratospheric ozone layer that protects life forms from excessive ultraviolet rays. It is wasting non-renewable resources at a terrific rate.

The system is arousing a revolution in expectations that cannot possibly be satisfied. It is increasing the gap between the rich and the poor within and between nations. As the poverty becomes unbearable, as competition for resources grows ever more fierce, widespread social unrest, violence and war will become inevitable.

The cause of the mess we are in is human ignorance and lack of moral and spiritual development. Most people are ignorant of the way in which their physical needs can be met; sustainably and in harmony with the natural order. Increasingly people are being misled by the false doctrine that "a person's good consists of the number of things they possess", which is being spewed out continually by the mass media. They spend their energies trying to get more and more money to get more possessions. They exert pressure on their children to compete in the money dominated system. Most of the more spiritually aware have succumbed to false narrow dogmas and the more concerned with their personal salvation than working for freedom, justice and equity for all.

THE SOLUTION

The way out of our troubles lies in spreading Truth; spreading knowledge of human bodily needs based on sound research and experience, not on animal experimentation, knowledge of the essential nature of humankind. This will lead to the vegan diet, to vegan organic food production, reforestation and a world order based on compassion, co-operation and mutual service.

Vegan Families - Lesley's Story

Having my first child, Jonathan, was a big change in my life, in more ways than I expected. What I could not have predicted was the way I was suddenly cut off from all my like-minded friends in the local vegan group and animal rights movement. I was so used to regular contact with other vegans, until my son was born, and never could imagine not feeling part of a sort of community.

Few people really can know how miserable and depressed I felt because I was so alone with my experiences and the difficulties of coping with a crying baby and not much sleep. I was not suffering classic post-natal depression, it was simply that I am not good at coping with being cut off from everything that means so much to me. My expectation had been that we would have this huge substitute family, and therefore at least one regular willing babysitter, made up of the vegan friends we had already known for several years. Our real families live far away and are mostly meat eaters.

In fact, we found ourselves no longer welcome, with a not always quiet small child, at the vegan group. It was just not a child-friendly group, and we found our long-standing friends unwilling or unable to change to accommodate us. Those I hoped might babysit, never did, and did not visit us either. I suspect none of them had a clue how trapped and lonely I was feeling. Other families we know have also found this group to be not very family-friendly. I do not feel that my old vegan friends are bad people, but they are possibly lacking in awareness of the needs of families.

I must add that my husband has been supportive, but he was always better than me at adjusting to parenthood, and we both agree that if I had his earning power I would have been the one to be the family breadwinner.

Once family commitments cause you to drop out of animal rights, it is a fact that everyone forgets you, thinks you don't care any more, and no longer tries to involve you. However, I have not forgotten about animal rights, and try to be active in my own small way. It is easier to be an activist without children, with like-minded company, than having to explain to the headmistress and Parents' Association, why you object to a recent Pringles (made by vivisectioners Procter and Gamble) promotional pack that was sent home with your child. I am always having to explain my veganism to the people around me, I rarely find any other parents living nearby who think the way I do. Despite this, I remain quite outspoken, because these other parents must be encouraged to think about the plight of animals. I intend to become more active in the movement as my two children get older.

A long time ago, I started thinking that many other vegan parents must feel the same isolation that I was experiencing. We had joined the Vegan Families Contact List, run by the Vegan Society. This is a list of vegan families willing to be contacted for mutual support, but it was only there on paper and nobody had started any groups, as far as I knew. There were quite a number in the London area on the list so I invited everyone to meet for a picnic in Hyde Park in Spring 1995. This was the start of the Vegan Families Group, which now runs regular children's picnics and parties for vegan families in London.

The Vegan Society helped to fund a party in January 1996 at Conway Hall and since then we have had picnics at Highgate and Clapham Common, and parties mostly at Coram Fields. This is an excellent venue with a large outdoor playground. In September 1998 we took part in the National Vegan Festival and this party was in great demand.

The group has gone from strength to strength due to the commitment of a small number of vegan parents. The children have fun and we can all find friends and mutual support. Some families come occasionally from Wales and the Midlands, and children's ages range from babies to almost teens. Last Summer we held a vegan mums' meal out at the Windmill, in Fulham. They saved it from being a disaster when Gardners closed unexpectedly.

I really hope that more vegan families groups will start in other areas. There seem to be enough on the Vegan Families Contact List in Manchester to form a group, for instance.

I do still hear from vegan parents in more remote areas, experiencing real isolation, especially those living in farming communities, or those experiencing pressure from their doctors.

We would love to hear from any more vegan families who may like to meet others. Even if you live too far from London, send an SAE to the Vegan Society for their list of families and if you wish to be included on the list, send details such as names and dates of birth of children.

Mill Hill Anti-Vivisection Action

Mill Hill AVA is a new group that has been formed to campaign against experiments on animals undertaken at the National Institute of Medical Research (NIMR) in Northwest London. NIMR is the home of the Medical Research Council and is the most prestigious governmental laboratory in the UK. Over 200 scientists work there with a total budget of over £25 million per annum. The NIMR is notorious for the undercover investigation that took place there in 1989-90, which centred around 89 year old Professor William Feldberg's experiments on rabbits and cats.

Melody Macdonald and Mike Huskisson of the Animal Cruelty Investigation Unit succeeded in uncovering damning evidence of the most shocking cruelty on live, anaesthetised animals. Videotapes were made and when these were shown a huge public outcry ensued. Feldberg lost his licence. He had boasted on one of the tapes: "Look here, either I go on legally, if I am allowed, otherwise I go on illegally if I am not allowed, but go on I will." In fact he died an embittered man in December 1993 at the age of 93.

As a result of the expose a campaign was launched which resulted in many demos against the Institute, but in the early 1990s this lost momentum. Now Mill Hill AVA intends to step up the pressure again. We have held day, evening and all night vigils and the workers have been very defensive. Most walk or drive out without stopping, appearing ashamed and embarrassed. They are clearly under orders not to speak to us.

The demonstrations will continue and we are in the process of producing a special leaflet on this animal concentration camp, which will make everyone aware of what really goes on there - cruelty paid for out of taxpayer's money.

Animal Cruelty Investigation Group

There are two broad categories of assistance that individuals can provide to the likes of the ACIG. These are fieldwork and support work, both are equally important.

Fieldwork

This encompasses all work that is done out in the field where the cruelty occurs. The work can be divided into three broad categories: full undercover infiltration, semi-undercover infiltration and open observation. Individuals may specialise and choose to operate within one category only or they may switch categories from day to day, or even practice all three on a single day.

Support

The ACIG needs continued financial backing from its many supporters if it is to continue working in the field and particularly for the group to extend and expand its work. Funds can be contributed directly by individuals, can be raised by sponsored events or can be raised by jumble sales, etc. The ACIG also benefits from donations of mint, unused, postage stamps, petrol coupons and store saving stamps, etc. Any unwanted items such as binoculars, cameras, computer equipment, landrovers etc are invaluable. Donations of professional expertise from electronic engineers, motor engineers, computer experts, builders or anyone else with a trade that they think may be of assistance will be most welcome. To expand the ACIG need to recruit new supporters as they are entirely dependent on your efforts to spread the word.

The ACIG produce informative guides that expose the horrors of bloodsports, vivisection, factory farming, zoos, circuses, the fur trade etc. Leaflets are also available. If you can help the ACIG expose animal cruelty in any way then please get in touch.

Reply to Rabbix

by Edward Edwards A.D.

In Arkangel 19, we published an article by Rabbix, entitled 'Violence is Wrong'. Rabbix criticised Edward Edwards A.D. for his views on violence. These are some of the points Edward raised in his response...

A person going under the name of Rabbix has stated that all animal activists should be moving away from violence. There are two forms of aggression: Violence: the simple, instant action, the involuntary reflex movement where someone hits out in a burst of anger and there is the other form of aggression: VILENce: which is of a far more vicious nature. This form is planned in advance, in which every known weapon can be used and can subsequently lead to the murder of millions on the orders of others who give the signal to attack en masse or in groups with the intention of destroying the enemy. Of these two forms of violence, which is Rabbix referring to? One form of violence is carried out with a specific intention every now and again and the other is where millions are mass murdered legally. To work entirely within the law will not eliminate the second form of violence because it is carried out by a select grouping where only dedicated mass-murderers are allowed to join. These people are sponsored by Big Business and are given a permit to kill.

What cannot be condoned by any rational person / law is the VILENce carried out against others, which is quite different to the other form of violence. So that to work entirely within the law should be the aim of all those who oppose VILENce. However, you are not allowed to work 'entirely within the law'. This is because it is a select group who practice, and commit, the most hideous malevolent, vile aggression known which they incite others to attack. The important thing is to be fully aware of the laws and to understand them entirely. 99% of people have never seen the laws of which we are led to believe actually exist. In a democratic society it is our right to know.

Extremist threat to royal fur shoppers as client list is stolen

THE CLIENT list of London's leading furriers has been stolen by animal rights extremists, raising fears for the safety of hundreds of customers, many of them rich and famous.

Names, home addresses and telephone numbers of fur customers are now in the hands of groups who have threatened them with a campaign of harassment.

Senior staff at Calman Links of Knightsbridge, who hold Royal warrants for the Queen and the Queen Mother, were in a crisis meeting with police today to decide on what action to take and what security advice they should give. The activists have already used the list to send a hoax bankruptcy notice to customers to cause maximum damage to the company.

In the hoax letter Calman Links appears to make a grovelling apology and ask customers to collect their coats by tomorrow when they are due to cease trading.

It reads: "We regret to inform you that our entire client list has been obtained by animal rights extremists. This was as a result of total neglect and incompetence on our part for which we humbly

by PATRICK MCGOWAN

apologise." At the shop today a senior manager said: "We are not closing down, definitely not. You can have that in black and white. We have a crisis on at the moment and we are trying to sort it out with police and our customers."

The animal rights group Fur-Free London claimed today the client list had been obtained "by an internal source". The group issued a statement saying: "Full details of the fur owners, including information about the furs they own, have already been circulated around the radical animal rights movement, and they can expect letters and calls of protest to arrive before too long."

Customers of Calman Links fear they may have to put up with more than just threatening phone calls. As the Fur-Free statement makes clear the list has been widely circulated throughout the movement. While the vast majority of protesters use peaceful means, the movement has at its fringes extremists who would not be out of place in a terrorist organisation.

In the past shops have been fire-bombed and bombs have been placed under cars. Even firms operating milk tankers have been targeted.

Calman Links customers were horrified to learn their names had been leaked. One woman from south-west London said: "I feel completely helpless. I have just one coat which the company has had in cold storage for me for about 10 years. I never wear it anyway because of the looks I get."

A Home Counties businesswoman said: "These people really are pathetic. I bet nearly all of them walk round in leather shoes."

"But they have shown that they can do awful things. It is awful not knowing if my home, my business or my car is going to be targeted."

Today a procession of women in fur-trimmed coats arrived at Calman Links. Manager John Gratter said: "The letter is a complete hoax. I think it is a very small number of customers who have been contacted, about 70 to 80."

Jan Brown, a spokesperson for the British Fur Council, said: "There is a fundamental principle here that everybody has the right to go about their business free from intimidation and harassment."

RSPCA fights motorbikes for hamsters

By Tarquin Cooper

A HAMSTER-powered toy motorbike, which allows the rodents to climb inside the front wheel and travel at speeds of 60 inches a second, has been criticised by the RSPCA.

The organisation has described the toy as unsuitable because it causes injuries. But Peter Doldings, who sells them in his pet shop Doolittles in Kent, said: "They love getting the exercise."

Jacky Laurie, regional manager of the RSPCA's south-east division, said the devices were inappropriate for small animals. "There has been lots of publicity about hamsters breaking their legs on wheels."

She added: "I personally don't like wheels in cages either because my feelings are they are totally inappropriate to buy as presents for small animals and far from their natural habitat."

Mr Doldings said: "It's an American product which has just been bought into the country. They're retailing at about £13. You put a wheel in the cage and two hamsters will squabble over it."

"We recommend they should only be allowed to use the bikes for up to 10 minutes at a time to prevent them becoming disorientated."

"We would make sure the people who bought them were responsible people. We wouldn't sell them to children who came in on their own."

Mrs Laurie suggested to anyone wishing to see their hamster on a spinning wheel, that it was far better and safer to compromise and use either "loo rolls or tubes".

Trainer videotaped 'abusing animals'

CIRCUS trainer Mary Chipperfield was accused of taking part in a catalogue of neglect and abuse against the animals in her care when she appeared in court yesterday.

The 61-year-old, along with her husband Roger Cawley, 64, deny cruelty charges relating to the care of animals at their winter training quarters near Andover, Hampshire.

The court heard how two members of the charity Animal Defenders secretly filmed the alleged abuse at Mary Chipperfield Promotions Ltd between October 1997 and January last year.

Charles Gabb, prosecuting at Andover magistrates court, outlined a catalogue of "neglect and gratuitous violence" said to have been carried out by the couple and one of their employees. Video footage played in court included scenes of Chipperfield, who gave her name in court as Mary Cawley, beating an 18-month-old chimpanzee called Trudy with a riding crop.

by GRAEME PATERSON

For several minutes, the animal appeared to scream in distress as she tried to coax it into its cage. In another shot, she was seen to kick the chimpanzee.

Mr Gabb told the hearing how the chimpanzee was left alone to sleep in a dog box in a dark barn with no toys. He also said that elephants at the farm, in Middle Wallop, Hampshire, were never bathed or taken outside.

The trial was adjourned to today.

Terror law to curb the animal fanatics

ANIMAL rights extremists, Islamic fundamentalists and even hardline anti-abortion campaigners face curbs on their activities under proposed new anti-terrorism laws.

Home Secretary Jack Straw wants current provisions extended to include any fanatics using serious violence to further their aims.

Membership of such groups could become illegal, in the same way that the IRA and its splinter groups are currently proscribed organisations under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, he revealed yesterday.

The definition of terrorism is to be widened to include any serious violence, including acts of disruption, 'in order to promote political, religious or ideological ends'. Currently only violence for political ends is defined as terrorism - effectively limiting it to Irish paramilitaries. Under Mr Straw's proposals, perpetrators will be subject to the full powers of arrest, detention, surveillance and sentencing deployed against paramilitaries.

'Our counter-terrorist provisions would for the first time apply to what we call domestic terrorism as well as Irish and international terrorism,' said the Home Secretary.

He is proposing a permanent law, unlike the Prevention of Terrorism Act, which needs to be renewed annually by Parliament.

But some of the most controversial existing measures, such as exclusion orders which can be used to prevent suspected terrorists travelling between Britain and Ireland, would go.

Mr Shaw's plans were unveiled in a consultation paper which specifically refers to animal rights militants and even Scottish and Welsh nationalist extremists.

Animal rights activists, for instance, were behind more than 800 attacks on chemists, doctors, furriers and others last year, causing injury and millions of pounds' damage.

Scotts nationalist extremists have been responsible for 40 incidents in the past five years

'Only the violent will be targeted' including letter bombs and bomb hoaxes.

Mr Straw also warned anti-abortion extremists that if they import the violent practices of militants in America - who have murdered doctors and bombed clinics - they will be treated as terrorists.

He pointed to the rise religious fanaticism, such as Islamic extremism and the release of deadly nerve gas on the Tokyo underground in 1995 by the Aum Shinrikyo cult, as another specific concern - particularly as the threat of Irish terrorism begins to recede.

'For the victims in particular, the origins of terrorism or the ideology supposedly behind it are probably not relevant when the violence has caused loss of life or destruction of a business,' he said.

'But clearly it will be only the most extreme and violent action which will come within this ambit. We are certainly not saying that all animal rights activists are terrorists.'

The Home Secretary is seeking comments on his proposals, which also target the funds of terrorist organisations by making the seizure of their assets easier even if they have not been convicted of any crime but are merely under strong suspicion.

Man gets hook in throat

A lifeboat crew went to the aid of a fisherman off the Suffolk coast yesterday after he got a large hook through his throat.

The Aldeburgh lifeboat was launched after a call that a crew member on board the fishing vessel Silver Harvest was in trouble. The man was hauling in cod nets when the three-inch baited hook became embedded in his throat.

The vessel was five miles off Orford Ness and the Aldeburgh crew went to the scene at about 8.45am.

They took him back to Aldeburgh where he was picked up by an ambulance and taken to hospital.

Camera that can spot a crime being committed

A REVOLUTIONARY closed-circuit TV system that "recognises" criminal behaviour is being tested by Scotland Yard.

The remarkable technology will enable surveillance cameras to identify potentially violent behaviour and could be operational early in the 21st century.

The system works by recognising certain pre-programmed "criminal" actions such as a man persistently kicking with his leg, or raising his arm. The cameras sound an alarm when they pick up a suspect action and enable the operator to focus in.

However, police accept the technology has drawbacks. One police source said: "The problem is a man stabbing someone could also be a man hailing a taxi, or a man kicking someone could equally be a man trying to get something off his shoe. What this system enables us to do is to zoom in

by JUSTIN DAVENPORT Crime Correspondent

on what is happening so we can check if a criminal act is taking place. The system has huge potential but you need to keep the human element."

The project uses the latest "pattern recognition" technology which has been developed in America for space and defence programmes. Ultimately, scientists believe it could be possible to police entire areas using CCTV systems that automatically alert authorities to criminal activity.

The research into the system is being carried out by scientists working for Scotland Yard's Technology Department. Dr Mike Taylor, the Yard's technology director, said the main barrier to the system's development was the quality of images produced by existing CCTV equipment. He said: "It is perfectly feasible to develop software which can distinguish certain actions but the quality of image means it is often difficult to see exactly what is going on."

So far, the project is not being used at any trial sites in London. But Scotland Yard is already pioneering CCTV technology which can recognise the faces of known criminals.

The six-month pilot project with the local authority in Newham works by scanning the faces of people caught on CCTV and comparing them with images on a database.

However, the police admit it only has an 80 per cent detection rate and the City of London police abandoned a trial into a similar system. In one case the cameras failed to recognise a "suspect" wearing a false beard.

Group Claims Responsibility For Blazes At Vail Resort

By JAMES BROOKE

DENVER, Oct. 21 — The Earth Liberation Front, a shadowy group that has taken responsibility for a series arson fires in the Northwest, declared in an E-mail communiqué today that the fires atop Vail mountain on Monday were carried out "on behalf of the lynx."

"Putting profits ahead of Colorado's wildlife will not be tolerated," read the brief statement, which was sent electronically to several Colorado news organizations. "We will be back if this greedy corporation continues to trespass into wild and unroaded areas."

The seven fires caused about $12 million worth of damage to buildings and chair lifts along a 11,200-foot-high ridge that overlooks a National Forest area where Vail started clearing trees on Friday as part of a controversial expansion. Earlier this year, environmentalists, back country skiers, and many residents of Eagle County had spoken out at public meetings to block Vail's plan to expand into an area seen as potential habitat for the reintroduction of the lynx in the Colorado Rockies.

Vail, which plans to open for skiing on Nov. 6, is the nation's busiest ski area, selling 1.6 million lift tickets last winter.

Addressing the nation's skiers, the communiqué warned: "For your safety and convenience, we strongly advise skiers to choose other destinations until Vail cancels its inexcusable plans for expansion."

This evening in Vail, the Eagle County Sheriff's office, said after receiving the two paragraph statement by fax: "Currently investigators are reviewing the origin and the content for credibility and will continue its investigation using this communiqué as a source for information."

Campaigners fight to stop trial duck cull

ANIMAL rights campaigners have been picketing the RSPB's "flagship" Minsmere nature reserve in a protest over the society's support for a shooting programme aimed at an "alien" species of duck.

The society is backing a Government decision to go ahead with a trial cull to establish whether it is feasible to substantially reduce numbers of the ruddy duck, imported into this country from North America in the 1940s and now widespread.

Other European countries are pressing Britain to kill the bird because of fears it will continue to cross-breed with the endangered white-headed duck, the global population of which is now thought to be less than 10,000.

Ruddy ducks are said to be already mating with white-headed ducks in Spain, which has Europe's only surviving colony, and there are fears the latter breed will die out.

Campaigners from Animal Aid arrived at Minsmere on Saturday to lobby visitors and ask them to withdraw membership and other financial support from the RSPB.

Hundreds of members nationally have already resigned over the controversy.

Some of the campaigners were dressed in duck costumes and one was in the guise of an upper-class shooter.

Elephant threat as ivory ban is lifted

BY JOHN INGHAM ENVIRONMENT CORRESPONDENT

ELEPHANTS are facing a "bloodbath" after the ivory trade was reopened yesterday, wildlife campaigners warned. Namibia, Botswana and Zimbabwe will be allowed to sell ivory from their stockpiles to Japan, ending the worldwide ban set up nine years ago.

Although no other countries were granted permission to sell ivory, environmental groups fear poaching will take off across Africa and Asia because there is no way of telling where a particular tusk comes from.

The standing committee of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species agreed to a strictly limited trial to see if it can be managed without threatening the elephant's future. But Care for the Wild director Chris Jordan said: "This decision will cause a bloodbath and a free-for-all for poachers."

New code limits police bugging operations to serious crime

Alan Travis
Home Affairs Editor

ROAD protesters and other civil disobedience campaigners will not be the target of police undercover bugging and bugging operations under a revised Home Office code of practice published last night.

"Intrusive surveillance" operations will also be banned in churches and temples where a minister of religion is giving spiritual counselling such as absolution.

This concession brings other churches and faiths into line with the Roman Catholic Church whose sacramental confessional was regarded as confidential and sensitive in the original guidelines. It follows concerns expressed by the Church of England.

The police will now have to get express permission from the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chief Rabbi or the head of the appropriate religion before bugging such conversations between a minister and parishioner.

The revised code of practice follows a parliamentary battle over the new statutory powers for police to mount such intrusive surveillance operations.

The Home Secretary, Jack Straw, last night said there were now specific references to the confidential and sensitive nature of information which passed between doctors and their patients, lawyers and their clients, and spiritual counselling.

The new guidance also makes clear that in all but exceptional cases the police will have to get prior permission from a "surveillance commissioner" — a former judge — before they can mount such an operation. They are allowed to ask for permission after the event in urgent cases but this must not be done routinely.

When they come into force early next year, the powers will put police bugging operations on to a statutory footing for the first time. There are about 2,550 intrusive surveillance operations each year, mostly involving placing tracking devices on cars or lorries.

The guidelines emphasise that the powers must only be used in serious crime cases, such as drug trafficking.

We're pragmatic farmers and we want a deal, but the deal has to be a fair compensation for our livelihoods."

Fur loses its cover

BY STEVE LODGE

SUPERMODELS infamously started wearing them again — and they remain perennially fashionable among Italians. But one travel insurer is refusing to cover fur coats.

The new exclusion, which extends to other animal-fur items such as hats and gloves, is being written into its policies by Kent-based Worldwide Travel Insurance. The insurer will no longer pay out for lost or damaged fur, although artificial fur items continue to be covered.

Worldwide director Sasha Bonner-Williams denies the exclusion is aimed at cutting underwriting costs or because the insurer has had large numbers of claims for fur coats.

"It's just something we don't want to encourage," she says. "If we paid out we would be encouraging the purchase of a new fur coat — which would only cause further suffering for animals."

Bonner-Williams says she knows of no other insurer with an outright ban, although in practice some would not cover the whole cost of a coat because it would breach the limit for valuable individual items. A new fur coat might cost £2,000 or more.

Worldwide sells annual travel insurance at £75 for a single person, while cover for a two-week winter sports holiday is £29.90.

Scandal of British dogs sold for food in back streets of Asia

BY JOHN INGHAM
ENVIRONMENT CORRESPONDENT

BRITISH pedigree dogs are being sold as meat in the Far East, it was claimed yesterday.

Thousands of dogs are exported to Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Thailand and China where they are used as "breeding machines" at puppy farms, says the World Society for the Protection of Animals.

Once their breeding days are over, many are sent to be butchered. The animals' pups are often abandoned, only to end up starving on the streets, being put down or sold for meat, according to a year-long investigation.

WSPA officials were repeatedly told dogs in the street markets were British. Pedigrees fetch a higher price because traders sell them as "luxury health food".

They saw live dogs crammed into cages next to skinned dogs. Trucks arrived with animals so tightly packed their limbs were "intertwined".

The terrified dogs were then taken to be slaughtered and their howls filled the market as they were hanged.

WSPA spokesman Jonathan Owen said: "There is no doubt British dogs are ending up on the table."

Blair rejects Tory call for three-year moratorium

MP links genetic food to 37 deaths

David Hencke
Westminster Correspondent

AN OUTBREAK of a fatal disease that infected 5,000 people, killing 37 and leaving 1,500 permanently ill, was linked to genetically modified food, a Labour MP claimed in a Commons debate yesterday.

The allegation came as Tony Blair came under fire for rejecting demands for a three-year moratorium on GM foods. The Tory leader, William Hague, accused the Prime Minister of ignoring his own advisers in refusing to implement a ban on GM crops until there has been more research.

Earlier Joan Walley, MP for Stoke-on-Trent North, called for an immediate ban on commercial use of GM food. She said: "Despite reassurances that these products are rigorously tested and safe, there have been unexpected incidents and illnesses apparently caused by them. In the worst case, I understand a US epidemic of a disease known as EMS, affected apparently some 5,000 people. An estimated 37 died, and 1,500 have been left permanently disabled with sickness."

She understood that the outbreak "was traced to a batch of food supplement produced by genetically engineered bacteria". Mrs Walley based her claim on a scientific article by Dr Michael Antoniou, a senior lecturer in molecular pathology at a London teaching hospital.

Joan Walley... cited US outbreak of killer disease

Dr Antoniou quoted a case involving a Japanese company that produced a food supplement, vitamin B2, adding that "whether the presence of the toxin was a direct result of the genetic engineering or was due to sloppy manufacturing procedures is still under debate". But he pointed out that under British government rules the product would not need to be labelled or be given marketing approval.

Mr Hague demanded at Prime Minister's question time: "Why hasn't the Government accepted the advice of English Nature, which is by law the Government's advisers on these matters, by delaying for at least three years the commercial release of these crops until more research is done?"

Mr Blair countered: "There is a committee in the Government looking at this on the basis of scientific evidence — I think that is the best way to proceed. The worst way is to raise fears in the public mind before the evidence is put before them."

In the earlier Commons debate Mrs Walley won cross-party support from Labour backbenchers Barry Sheerman and Joan Ruddock, former Tory minister Alan Clark, and Lib Dem MP Norman Baker.

Jeff Rooker, the deputy agriculture minister, said the Government had not authorised the growing of genetically modified food for commercial use in Britain. There is "none planned and when it does happen it will be a controlled introduction, it will not be a free-for-all", he said.

Last night Friends of the Earth food campaigner, Peter Riley, claimed licences had already been granted for the commercial planting of oil seed rape, fodder beet and maize for seed production. "The first commercially grown GM crops could be planted in our fields in the next few months unless the Government takes steps to stop them."

Wildlife fears

Ministers are to push for tough new laws to protect wildlife sites after claims that increasing amounts of land are being developed or damaged. Environmental pressure groups said that the Government had failed to implement any measures to protect wildlife since it took office.

Kangaroo meat sale stopped

ANIMAL rights campaigners yesterday declared victory over Sainsbury's after the supermarket chain decided to withdraw kangaroo meat from its shelves.

But Sainsbury's denied that the campaign by vegetarian charity Viva had prompted its actions, instead blaming low customer demand for the meat.

Viva was planning its second national day of action against Sainsbury's with demonstrations outside stores next month. The group claimed that millions of baby kangaroos, left to fend for themselves when their parents were killed, were the innocent by-product of the trade in kangaroo meat. Viva director Juliet Gellatley said: "Supermarkets wield such enormous power that they often seem invulnerable, but they aren't."

Election called over fur tag

COUNCILLORS in Beverly Hills, Los Angeles, have voted 3-1 for a special election on May 11 to decide on whether to have a "consumer notice" tag in fur coats. A typical tag may read: "This product is made with fur from animals that may have been killed by electrocution, gassing, neck-breaking, poisoning, clubbing, stomping, or drowning, and may have been trapped in steel-jaw, leg-hold traps." — Christopher Reed, LA.

A project to tempt otters back to the Thames has been launched near Maidenhead in Berkshire. It is hoped that by improving riverside habitat and water quality, the three-year, £170,000 scheme will encourage the return of the mammals. Wild otters were last resident in the Thames in the 1970's, before intensive agricultural pesticides and habitat damage led to their decline. The otter was brought to the edge of extinction by hunting, pollution and encroachment on their environment by expanding towns. Contamination by agricultural pesticides and fertilisers caused fish numbers to drop and starved the otters. Present numbers for otters are about 3,000. The Government has pledged to reintroduce the otter to all its pre-1960 habitats by 2010. The scheme is part of the National Otter Biodiversity Action Plan, which was launched last summer. A national police unit is being set up to track green activists and public demonstrations amid fears that eco-warriors are becoming increasingly disruptive and violent. The intelligence squad will use information from Special Branch and MI5 to compile profiles, and will target road protesters, live animal exports, industrial disputes, hunt saboteurs and far-right groups and head off potential disorder. The new unit will be called the National Public Order Intelligence Unit and will be based at New Scotland Yard. The new unit will include three units presently monitoring New Age Travellers, hunt saboteurs and animal rights protesters. The Animal Rights National Index will be part of the new unit with contributions of information from MI5 and Special Branch. (Independent 7.11.98)

wearing members of the aristocracy following the apparent theft of the royal furrier's client database. Calman links, which supplies the Queen and Queen Mother, have already been targeted by activists. The list has been circulated by Fur-Free London. Activists have used the list to send a hoax bankruptcy notice to at least 50 customers, which Calman Links has apologised for. Two police officers stood guard outside the Knightsbridge store yesterday. (Guardian 17.11.98)

Sales of organic food in Britain are likely to triple in the next four years to more than £1bn a year, with leading supermarkets agreeing with the Soil Association, but saying they saw the figures as conservative. Figures have quadrupled since 1993. Consumer alarm over food safety is thought to be the reason. Growth of 40% a year until 2002 is expected, taking more than 7% of the UK market for foodstuffs. Demand is already at 20% of the market, despite higher prices. At the moment, 70% of organic food sold in Britain is imported. Sainsbury's is currently selling £1m of organic produce a week. One in ten British babies is already fed on organic food, said Lizzie Vann, founder of Organix, a company which makes organic baby food, and the figure is likely to double in the next few years. Currently there are about 1,000 organic farmers in Britain. (Independent 7.11.98)

Animal rights groups and tourists in Paris have complained about the birds and animals at the open-air market at the Quai de la Megisserie, one of Paris's best loved sights. Paris police have decided the cages must be moved indoors, or taken away. Hens, ducks, pheasants, turkeys, pigeons, goats, rabbits, dogs and cats wait in rows. The outdoor cages are a disgrace, say critics, claiming the animals are squashed in and exposed to rain, wind and excessive heat. The shops owning the out-door cages are mostly small, so the ban will probably force them to give up selling some kinds of creatures or close altogether. (Independent 18.11.98)

Angry baboons took revenge when an animal inspector accidentally killed one of their own with a tranquilliser dart. The monkeys of Cape Town Peninsula's baboon colonies decided to visit Shaun Bodington, even though he lived 12 miles away from the scene of the killing. As Mr. Bodington sat in his lounge, the 35-strong troupe poured into his garden and pulled up his plants. Earlier this year there were reports of chimps declaring war on a village in Cameroon which "kidnapped" a baby chimp, only leaving after the baby was released. (Express 30.10.98)

Malaysia is considering gassing pigs en masse because troops sent in to prevent the spread of a deadly virus cannot shoot them quickly enough. Authorities admitted yesterday they know almost nothing about a second virus that might have caused many of the 62 human deaths blamed on the outbreak of Japanese encephalitis. Some 1,000 soldiers have killed more than 70,000 pigs in the worst-hit state in the past week. Authorities had planned to shoot more than 350,000 pigs over 10 days, but because this took too long, were planning to gas 280,000 remaining animals in the main pig-breeding areas. The encephalitis is carried by mosquitoes and harboured in pigs. Little is known about the second virus except that it may be related to a fruit bat virus discovered in Australia in 1994. (Independent 27.3.99)

For the third time in five years, scientists have discovered a hitherto unknown mammal lurking in the Vu Quang forest of Vietnam. The dwarf muntjac deer weighs 35 lbs., half the size of the common muntjac. The midget muntjac brings the total of "new" mammals discovered worldwide in the past 60 years to about 17. But almost everywhere, wild animals are in retreat, biologists estimating three species are being extinguished every hour. (Guardian 23.8.97)

For purposes of blackmail or revenge, pets are being forced into microwave ovens before the eyes of their frightened owners. If the ovens are switched on the animals are cooked from the inside by short electromagnetic waves. The RSPCA said it was appalled that people would torture pets, and would be seeking prison sentences for those found culpable. Police are seeking a gang after they threatened to cook a couple's cat before making off with £18,500. The cat was unharmed. However, 24 year old Brendan Blennerhassett was jailed for six months in County Durham after being found guilty of killing a 12 week-old kitten after being spurned by the cats owner. The RSPCA has reported the case of a 13 year-old boy that killed the family whippet for "fun" after putting it in a microwave. (Independent 23.8.97)

Almost four million tons of imported soya and maize feed purchased by livestock farmers in 1997 and 1998 would have been derived from GM crops, Agriculture minister Jeff Rooker said. (Independent 19.3.99)

A fresh row is brewing between the US and Europe over GM products prompted by the biotechnology giant Monsanto, this time over milk. New scientific studies suggest that an artificial hormone, called Posilac by Monsanto, used in the US to make cattle produce more milk could raise the risk of breast and prostate cancer in humans. The US government is now pushing Europe to end a moratorium on the use of animal growth hormones, imposed in 1989 on the grounds that Europe already overproduced milk and beef, which was extended in 1996 and 1997. The US says the ban infringes free trade rules, and the ability of Monsanto to trade in its patented hormone. Since the ban on BST came into force in 1997, new scientific evidence has found giving excessive levels of the hormone to cattle can cause a fivefold rise in the levels of a protein called IGF-1 (immune growth factor) in the milk, studies of which, published in the Lancet and Science, showed an increased level of prostate cancer in men and breast cancer in women. Senior vets have called for the EC to continue the ban. (Independent 22.3.99)

A medical journal has forecast a "grim outlook" following an unexpected increase in deaths from nv-CJD. Since it first emerged in 1996, it has claimed an average of two or three lives every three months. But in the final quarter of last year nine deaths were recorded. In an editorial, the Lancet said "The outlook, from many aspects, is grim. In the UK, the BSE inquiry will almost certainly publish an anodyne report and conclude that no one is to blame". Genetically engineered crops altered to be resistant to common plant viruses, risk creating new mutant strains of "super-viruses" which could wipe out entire farms, a damning research report commissioned by the Government has warned. It found that plants engineered to be resistant to common viruses could be in fact lead to the creation of more virulent strains which could spread throughout the British countryside. The scientists warn that genetic engineering will make viruses more prevalent in the countryside, with the likelihood of plants being exposed to a virus is a billion times more likely. For most of today's common solid cancers, the ones that cause 90% of the cancer deaths every year..... chemotherapy has never been proven to do any good at all. (Independent on Sunday 15.11.98)

More than one million animals have been genetically modified for use in British laboratory experiments in the past four years, the bulk involving mice and rats. Scientists have also started creating GM animals which could be farmed for food. Pigs, cattle, sheep, chickens and fish are being altered so they grow faster, and bigger and produce more young. 353,000 GM animals were used in experiments in 1997, a 17% increase on 1996 and more than 60% up on 1995. Figures for 1998, released in July, are expected to show numbers close to 400,000. Many involve transgenic techniques, genetic material from one species transplanted into another species. British scientists working at Harvard University have produced the first three-legged chicken. In the U.S., pigs, chickens and fish are all being produced with genes that speed growth. Transgenic salmon which have a flounder gene speeds their growth rates by up to 400%. Researchers in Israel are working on featherless chickens, whilst scientists at Newcastle upon Tyne are attempting to create grass eating breeds of pigs and hens. Researchers in Australia injected sheep with a genetically-engineered hormone so the fleece fell off without shearing. The animal suffered severe sunburn and heat stress and increased chance of miscarriage. (Daily Mail 16.3.99)

The Government's most senior medical officer at the height of the BSE epidemic, Sir Donald Acheson, claimed that he was forced to make statements about the safety of British beef, including that beef could be eaten safely by everyone. Sea Shepherd

The Sea Shepherd Conservation Society is a non-profit non-governmental organisation (NGO) involved with the investigation and documentation of violations of international laws, regulations and treaties protecting marine wildlife species. The Society is also involved with the enforcement of international laws, regulations and treaties when there is no enforcement by national governments or international regulatory organisations due to absence of jurisdiction or lack of political will. The Society will investigate, document and enforce any high seas drift net operation that is in violation of the United Nations resolution outlawing drift nets and will uphold and defend all principles established by international conventions to protect and conserve marine species and ecosystems.

The Society is committed to the goal of "being in business for the purpose of putting ourselves out of business", but unfortunately, illegal operations (especially whaling) have not only continued but have escalated in recent months. Sea Shepherd will remain devoted to protecting the citizens of the oceans as long as is necessary and needs your help to do so. Supporting members of Sea Shepherd receive a quarterly newsletter which contains educational information, updates on current laws and legislation, addresses for writing protest letters and news of SSCS activities.

As big as a crow and twice the size of its nearest British relative, it is traditionally a bird of Central European forests. Their population expansion is linked to deciduous woodland maturing across Europe - they particularly like tall beach trees- and also the growth of Norway spruce plantations. (Independent)

The Moray Firth dolphins, one of only two resident populations in Britain, are suffering from severe skin disease, a world-wide study has found. Some of the animals have two-thirds of the visible parts of their bodies covered in lesions, while in others the normally dark smooth skin has turned orange or is pitted. Nearly all 130 in the colony are suffering. No link has been found between the skin disease and pollution, but there may be a link with water temperature and salinity. The Moray Firth dolphins are the most northerly residents in the world and live in colder less saline water than any other. Bottleneck colonies have been studied around the world and all were found to have some skin disease. (Independent 15.3.99)

Last week the group struck again, marking an escalation in a campaign of economic sabotage which one campaigner said is intended to drive the Belgian hamburger industry out of business. No other country has suffered such a sustained bout of eco-terrorism against burger bars - 10 this year. Other parts of the meat industry have been attacked, including meat trucks and cold storage units, mostly by arson attacks, but the main targets have been McDonald's and Quick, a home-based burger outfit with the largest number of outlets in Belgium. One of China's leading wildlife conservationists has been shot dead, apparently by hunters angered by his protection of the endangered Tibetan antelope, the China Youth Daily reported. The dead man's predecessor was killed by poachers four years ago. The Tibetan antelope, also called the Chiru, is prized for the wool around its throat Trade in it has been illegal since 1976 but shawls woven in Kashmir sell for more than £9,000 in Europe. Conservationists estimate that there are 75,000 to 100,000 Tibetan antelopes left in the wild, but that 20,000 are killed each year by gangs killing 500 at a time and smuggling the wool to India. From today, nuts join red wine as they have been found to significantly reduce the risk of heart disease. The research by nutritionists at Harvard University school of health, focused on the diets of 86,000 female nurses aged 34-59 over 14 years, and found those who ate five or more portions of nuts a week were a third less likely to be at risk of a coronary than those who ate none. Indeed, those who ate two to four of the one-ounce portions a week were also less at risk than those who ate just one. Nut-eaters were more likely to be leaner, smoke and drink less, exercise more and take multi-vitamins. But even after those factors were eliminated, they still cut their risk of heart disease by 35%. Up to 10% of species could disappear in the next 25 years because of human activity, but millions have yet to be named and described. Naturalists about to publish a new survey of the nation's knowledge of wildlife have announced an unexpected appendix - a British fern new to science. In the past six years researchers have identified more than 70 species of lichen and more than 100 kinds of parasitic wasp hitherto unknown in Britain - and confirmed that world-wide the extinction of plants and animals may have accelerated 1,000-fold or even 10,000-fold since the beginning of the industrial revolution. There could be 13 million species on the planet, according to a document, The Web of Life, published today. Only about 1.7 million have been described, but because there is no single international library of creation, many of these may have been discovered more than once. Animal rights fanatics are to be included in sweeping new anti-terrorist powers announced yesterday. Jack Straw unveiled a raft of measures to extend Northern Ireland's tough security laws to cover domestic and international terrorism, replacing the temporary powers of the Prevention of Terrorism Act with permanent legislation. The new measures will allow for the proscription of any organisation that used serious violence within the UK for political, religious or ideological ends. (Independent 18.12.98)

The urban common toad in our gardens, parks and cemeteries are becoming dangerously isolated: the rural toad, with its broad acres is less threatened. Toads can survive for at least eight years in the wild and remain fairly faithful to their breeding sites. Adult females spawn once a year. After spawning they can roam up to 3K from their home pond but usually stay within 400 to 1,500 metres. They need a moist microclimate, cover from predators and a food supply. These conditions are increasingly limited in urban environments criss-crossed with roads and other barriers. (Guardian 17.12.98)

A mink farmer whose animals were released by anti-fur activists was yesterday fined after admitting a string of cruelty charges and breaches of welfare regulations. Terence Smith, who trades under the name of TT Smith (Mink) Ltd, was fined £5,000 and ordered to pay costs of £15,000 by magistrates at Lyndhurst, Hampshire. (Independent 12.3.99)

The Arctic circle 90 million years ago was a landscape of steaming swamp and fetid forest. It sweltered in the summer and even at its coldest hardly ever froze. Ecologists have suspected this for years, but the discovery of a fossilised femur from a large crocodile-like reptile 700 miles from the pole has proved tremendously important. Its nearest relatives live only in the tropics and subtropics. (Guardian 18.12.98)

Turtle doves and partridges are in severe decline in the English countryside. The population of the grey, or English, partridge has fallen by 78% in 25 years. The turtle dove is down to just 50,000 pairs, a decline of 85% over the same period. A study into the reason for the loss has been launched. (Daily Mail 16.12.98)

Europe's only permanent population of sperm whales faces extinction because they are going deaf, it is claimed. Marine biologists have found that the estimated 400 whales living around the Canary Islands are being deafened by intense traffic on the busy shipping route. Damage to the ultrasound system they use to communicate and navigate means they cannot find mates, or are killed in collisions with ships. (Daily Mail 16.12.98)

International Otter Survival Fund

The IOSF is the only organisation in the world dedicated to the conservation of all 13 species of otter. The organisation is working with people world-wide identifying threats to otters, and taking steps to overcome these, and thus preserving some of the world's great habitats not just for otters but for all wildlife living there.

IOSF supports the following work:

- Funds otter conservation programmes world-wide
- Supports where possible the prohibition of hunting
- Organises public education programmes to develop support for otter conservation
- Supports otter rehabilitation facilities for orphaned, sick or injured otters.

The IOSF has a visitor centre in Broadford, Isle of Skye, where you can learn more about their work. The organisation also takes in orphaned and injured otters (and other wildlife) and can offer advice should you find any casualty.

The world's last 25 Northern White Rhinos are threatened with extinction in Congo, the WWF said yesterday. Patrols have been cut back because of fighting in Congo, making the rhino more vulnerable to poachers. (Guardian 18.12.98)

The soothing hum of the bumble bee could soon be a thing of the past. Ten out of the 16 species found in Britain have disappeared since the 1960's and of the remaining six, one is already presumed extinct, and the rest are in grave danger, according to the WWF. At present, three species are becoming extinct every two years in the UK. The short-haired bumble bee brings the number of species extinct in Britain to 154. (Daily Mail 14.12.98)

The bird that most people expect to see over Christmas is a blackbird, replacing the sparrow as the most commonly seen species in British gardens. Sparrows have dropped to sixth place and starlings to ninth after a nation-wide slump in their numbers.

The house sparrow has been afforded "high alert" status by the British Trust for Ornithology because numbers have plunged by two-thirds since 1973. In 1997 the mix of birds included blackbirds, blue tit, robin, great tit, chaffinch, house sparrow, collared dove, dunnock, starling and greenfinch. The magpie and coal tit were also common visitors. The reason for the change in birds visiting gardens is that many more people feed them and there is a wider choice of food. Feeding birds is fine providing the food is not salty as inland birds are poisoned by salt. (Guardian 23.12.98)

Pregnant deer and their calves are being killed and mutilated in a little known sport of hind hunting. Hundreds of female deer, or hinds, are chased for miles by hunters and packs of hounds. The ancient sport is now practised only in Devon and Somerset. The National Trust and the Forestry Commission have already banned hind hunting on their land, along with stag hunting. Before the last election the Labour party promised to ban the sport along with other forms of hunting with hounds. Hind hunts begin when about 40 hounds are set on a herd of pregnant deer. They pick out one hind and her calf and chase them for up to four hours. After a few miles the young calf becomes exhausted and is forced to hide while its mother tries to draw off the pursuing hounds. After another five or six miles, the pregnant deer is cornered until a huntsman arrives and shoots her with a shotgun. She is then disembowelled and her feet taken as souvenirs. (Express 29.12.98)

British seabirds may live up to 100 years. Recoveries of ringed birds indicate greater longevity in species such as fulmar, gannet, Manx shearwater and storm petrel. All these birds are slow breeders, not laying until they are seven or eight years old, and then only a single egg. (Independent 30.12.98)

A drug used to prevent tissue rejection after a transplant may be the reason why those patients are more likely to develop potentially fatal cancers. Cyclosporin, a drug used to suppress the immune system also inhibits the body's natural mechanism for tissue rejection, directly alters cancer cells to make them highly dangerous. Cyclosporin is given to most of the 2,500 patients who undergo organ transplants each year in Britain. (Independent 11.2.99)

Two Portsmouth brothers were fined a record £90,000 each after admitting taking and possessing rare birds eggs in the Orkney Islands. Human prejudices will determine the fate of Europe's large carnivores, its bears, lynxes and wolves, through the coming century, the WWF has said. People's views of them are often negative because of children's stories and exaggerated fears. The charity has launched an appeal to save them. The Iberian lynx is the world's most endangered cat with fewer than 800 left; its relative, the Eurasian lynx is down to 7,000 while the wolverine, a large relative of the weasel is down to 500 in Europe and 1500 in Russia. October 16th saw the party marking the 15th Anniversary of Veggies Catering Campaign.

The Nottingham-based vegan catering collective invited friends and supporters from the many and diverse campaign movements with whom they have worked since 1984.

The Veggies Crew were thrilled by the turnout, with the London pub-venue packed with eco-activists, campaigners against the arms trade, anarchists, vegetarian, vegan and animal rights advocates, McLibel supporters, street-reclaimers and many others involved in campaigns for social justice.

By midnight several hundred had passed through, with much outbursting of spontaneous hugging, general merriment, and fine sounds from guest musicians.

SOON AFTER THOUGH, UNINVITED 'GUESTS' ARRIVED TO SPOIL THE FUN

At about 12.20am, in a totally unrelated incident, it is thought that police had been seen nearby arresting, jostling or threatening 2 Asian youths.

One of Veggies guests, concerned by this incident went to find out what was happening & why.

Presumably his concerns fell on deaf ears, as he was arrested, possibly on a 'drunkenness' pretext.

Seeing a friend and colleague now involved, another woman went to ask why he had been arrested and was herself assaulted and arrested, without any reply or caution, and thrown into a police van, sustaining bruises to her arm.

At this point the few police in attendance felt a need to assert themselves and began thrashing at all in the area with batons, and called for 'Emergency Back-up'.

Within a minute 23 police cars and vans had begun to arrive, whilst many of those at the party, possibly fearing deliberate targeting of the event, were rushing out to give appropriate assistance to the victims.

By now the police seemed to lose control.

One man was on the road struggling to slide under a parked van to avoid a rain of baton blows. A later inspection revealed a pool of blood on the road and pavement. On Sunday evening this person was in hospital with a fractured skull and many stitches - maybe to be released from hospital on Monday, though is already arrested to 'justify' his beating.

A woman had to be helped back to the pub very distressed, nursing an injury to her wrist, in shock and requiring treatment at University College Hospital.

At some point a barrister, supportive of social justice causes and a guest at the party, was also injured, covered in bruises.

By about 12.30 police were demanding that everyone should clear off the street back and get back into the pub through the one open door. The police had barricaded the other door with benches and tables. Soon after they changed tack and demanded 'everyone must leave NOW - one at a time' (!)

After some discussion the consensus was to leave, partly out of concern for the pub staff who had been so friendly and supportive during the evening, as by now some police had forced their way into the pub and were threatening those inside. People were separated from their friends and their belongings.

Outside all were herded into a dark side street, with several trips and falls due to heavy handed pushing and indiscriminate use of batons.

It later transpired that a CID officer had been working undercover at the party (and the Anarchist Bookfair earlier), and used this opportunity to try to make an arrest.

Finally some senior officers arrived and called all the police away - seeming really annoyed that the whole situation had got out of hand, and was shaping up into a potential mini-riot.

Soon all the police had left, as quickly as they had arrived, leaving the remaining people to assess the situation.

THE FINAL TALLY

Five taken to Holborn Police station held until late Sunday afternoon - mostly charged with obstruction Seven taken to Kentish Town Police station. One woman held for court on Monday (unverified address). Various charges include threatening behaviour, obstruction & harassment.

One arrested and taken to hospital with fractured skull.

One taken to hospital by friends with injured wrist.

All expected to appear at Great Marlborough Street Court (near Carnaby Street) on Friday 22nd October.

QUESTIONS...

■ How did 23 police cars manage to arrive in a quiet backstreet in Holborn within minutes? On the day of the Anarchist Bookfair. Were they waiting nearby looking for (a chance to make) trouble?

■ Why did a police van from the City of London Police attend an incident in (non-City) Holborn. Were they hoping to find people from June 18th?

■ What was an undercover CID officer doing at an invite-only private party?

WHAT'S NEXT?

EVERYONE who was at the event is asked to contact VEGGIES.

■ Were you arrested or injured? - details please.

■ Did you directly witness any police violence?

■ Do you have recollections of the general police attitude and handling of the situation?

■ Had you already left the event, but with memories of the peaceful nature of the evening up until the unwelcome arrival of the police?

■ Do you know of anyone else that we should try to contact?

Send appropriate details - email is preferred, but may not be totally secure. Do not include any information which might be used to incriminate yourself or someone else.

Please consider making an official complaint about the policing of this incident. Ask for details.

DONATIONS to support those arrested should be sent c/o 'Veggies' or 'London Animal Action'.

Veggies pledge to support all those arrested. Our best wishes go to them and to those injured or harassed.

THANKS

Thanks to the management and staff at the Apple Tree pub in Mount Pleasant, London WC1 for an otherwise excellent party!

Thanks to those involved in Saturday's the 40-strong London McDonalds picket, a campaign supported by Veggies since 1986. During the lead up to the day of action Veggies distributed over 30,000 Anti-Mac fliers to 25 groups in England, Scotland & Wales.

Thanks for your support at the Anarchist Bookfair, and to our volunteer crew & other helpers, who served 700 VeggieBurgers, 400 other savories, 400 cakes and 400 drinks - sorry there was nothing left for the party!

Thanks for saving the lives of ten cows during 1998 alone, by eating 26,800 VeggiesBurgers instead of CowBurgers.

Thanks to all who have supported Veggies since 1984, especially over the last 2 busy years, when funds have been raised for:

Save the Hillgrove Cats,
Anti-Genetics campaigning,
Save The Shamrock Monkeys, Campaign Against the Arms Trade, the (new) Burton Guinea Pigs campaign,
J18 Legal Defence, Nottm RTS,
Vegan Prisoners Support Group,
the Anarchist Bookfair,
Kingston Green Fair,
Northern Green Gathering,
National Vegan Festival,
Exodus Collective, Uncaged, Freshfields Animal Rescue, Nottm Rainbow Centre, and many others.

We will not be, and have not been, intimidated - the Bookfair, the McPicket, the Party were great!

Veggies Catering Campaign - providing the ideological glue that binds together our diverse movement. Join us in the next 15 years of protest... looking forward to a world without the oppression of people, animals or the environment.

Police to get power to tap e-mail

Computer users who refuse to divulge their passwords to the authorities face up to two years in prison under increased police powers to be unveiled in next month's Queen's speech. Other measures drawn up by the government will make it easier for companies to monitor employees' phone calls and e-mails. A third part of the crackdown will give the police new authority to tap mobile phone calls, pager messages and e-mail. The plans were already attracting criticism, with one Tory MP warning that the government risked creating "a state surveillance system like something out of Orwell's 1984."

Police officers who gain a search warrant from the courts can already look at computer files, but provisions in the forthcoming e-commerce bill will allow them to demand passwords used to protect sensitive data. The bill will also legally oblige Internet service providers (ISPs) to keep records showing to and from whom material has been sent and received. In spite of industry complaints about the cost, ministers want the ISPs to keep detailed records on all customers for days at a time.

The proposed new Interception of Communication Act will also deal with people who frequently change their mobile phone numbers and e-mail addresses, to exploit the fact that warrants are issued for a particular number of addresses. New catch-all warrants will cover all of a named individual's communications devices and will last for three months instead of two.

Appeal - Support the Protests Against Live Exports at Dover

The shipments are taking place at night, under the cover of darkness. Inspections at the docks range from 3 minutes - if they are lucky - some take 10 minutes. 500/700 animals on one transporter with the inspection being carried out by torch light. All are three tier transporters. The stench from these cargoes of misery is appalling.

Transporters arriving at Dover have already travelled from as far afield as Scotland, Wales and Yorkshire. Many of these animals are taken on the Cap Afrique (the boat from Hell) unrested, unfed and unwatered with a lengthy journey ahead of them. Transporters start arriving from 10:30pm onwards. Regular exporters through Dover are LE Jones (Wales), G Gilders (Glos.), Oliver (The Borders), Machin (Yorkshire). Machin - convicted of over 167 offences but still in business and sticking two fingers up at protesters. Numerous foreign trucks, some with trailers arrive nightly. Such names as Rinus Beer, Interbeke, Vee Handel, Langrish, Schappenhandel, Transovin, Bakum Pastour and many others. On several occasions Dutch trucks carried three drivers, often there are two, suggesting a long journey without a break for the victims on board these stinking hellish trucks. Often sheep are forced to sail in gale force conditions - The Cap Afrique being tug assisted out of the harbour.

August 16th - a Langrish transporter, extremely smelly, was being inspected by 3 MAFF, plus the driver looking in at the offside top tier - who was stuffing sheep first with his hands then with his feet. Evidently with MAFF looking on.

On the 17th of August a Dutch transporter - Nuyessenburgh - with three drivers, one of whom saw fit to urinate up the side of his vehicle even through toilets are close by and clearly marked. One of the drivers then proceeded to shove the sheep around through the slats as they awaited inspection. One unfortunate animal pushed its head through the slats. Clenching his fist this man punched it in the face with all his strength, driving the head back through the slats. Dover watchers were shocked and helpless to act so could only watch in horror.

AGONY OF BRITISH SHEEP!

Again in August a consignment of British sheep were trucked from Britain on a journey of around 40 hours to the port of Bari in southern Italy. On arrival the sheep were left in the truck in blistering heat for 48 hours. They were left craving water. They were in a terrible state. As the hours dragged on they became increasingly exhausted and dehydrated. The wretched creatures were in immense distress and gasping for air. Many had difficulty in breathing. 55 British sheep died in this catastrophe along with 17 French sheep. What an appalling way to die! These animals were part of a consignment destined for slaughter in Greece ~, involving a 17 hour ferry journey and an added road journey through Greece. Constantly our lambs and sheep are witnessed on the same route - Italy to Greece - the journeys lasting anywhere from 65 to 100 hours or more.

Every undercover trail reveals the same scene - one of appalling brutality meted out to defenceless, sick, injured, exhausted, terrified animals - during transport, disembarking points and slaughterhouses across Europe. Gratuitous violence carried out by depraved thugs on a monumental scale. Animals, their eyes bulging, are kicked and dragged to their ghastly slaughter. Their throats are slit while fully conscious, some taking several minutes to die. Helpless victims trying to raise their heads, while gurgling and choking in their own blood.

TRAGIC CONVOYS OF DEATH!

Approximately one million animals have been shipped from Dover in the last 12 months and Farmers Ferry Ltd boast a further million in the coming months. At present animals leave Dover 7 nights a week, with Friday night usually seeing the most trucks. Friday 10th September, 25 transporters sailed (approximately 17,000 in one shipment. 90 transporters for the week of 5th - 11th September - bound for the Hell Holes of Europe, where the doors to barbarity are flung wide open.

1,000,000 REASONS TO GO TO DOVER

People at Dover are desperate for support - for your support - once a week - once a month - please help!

These animals have been betrayed. They are indeed the forgotten ones. The tragic convoys of death are there for all to see. Animals are dying for your help. Please don't let them down.

When a lobster weighing nearly 20 pounds and believed to be between 60 and 140 years old was shipped to a Canadian seafood restaurant in Niagara Falls, the owner of the Fine Kettle O'Fish, Wayne Wall, admitted, "it's the first time I've ever had a moral dilemma with food." After Wall received phone calls from all over the world and offers totalling more than $10,000 to purchase the captive crustacean, he decided to return the ancient lobster (dubbed Crusty) to his home waters of Halifax. "He's lived about 100 years without getting caught," Wall said. "I hope he lives 100 more."

In the early part of 1999, Linhu Ye and Wanming Tan were charged in the Haixi Prefecture, Qinghai Province, with the killing of Tibetan Antelopes. The pair was accused of leading a group of poachers into Arjin Nature Reserve in May 1996 and killing 170 Antelopes; 120 skins were later sold. The Medium Court sentenced them to eight and four years' imprisonment, with fines equivalent to £600 and £500 respectively. A further two poachers, Haimai Han and Xuejun Ma, have been convicted in Xining, capital of Qinghai Province, for poaching Tibetan Antelopes and have been sentenced to seven and six years' imprisonment, respectively. The pair was accused of killing 110 Tibetan Antelopes in Kekexili Nature Reserve and of selling 200 Tibetan Antelope skins. Two cars purchased with money raised from the sale of the skins were confiscated. These two verdicts are the first since the Procuratorate of Qinghai Province issued an order in November 1998 to 'take stronger measures against the illegal poaching of Tibetan Antelope.'

EUROPE

The European Council of Farm Ministers on June 15, 1999 issued a directive ordering a 12-year phase-out of conventional battery caging for egg-laying hens. Various cage design improvements are to take effect meanwhile in 2002, 2003, and 2007. Only Spain opposed the directive in final form. The Council of Europe one week later told the European Commission that the 18 million ducks and 800,000 geese raised in France to produce foie gras should also be given adequate space to flap their wings and move normally, under a draft standard which is tentatively to take effect in 2010.

FRANCE

France has officially added the small ortolan songbird to its protected species list. The birds were considered culinary delicacies-eaten beak, bones, and all-and were a favourite of former president Francois Mitterand, who ate them at his last meal. Until now the ortolan was unclassified, listed among neither the protected nor the hunted species. The Green Party has called the birds' new status "the end of an archaic French practice."

POLAND

A recent symposium in Poland heralded a major victory for Wanda Blake, who has been working for years to get medical and veterinary schools in Poland to teach with videos rather than living animals. Representatives from more than one hundred schools attended and were extremely receptive to the speakers' persuasive arguments against using live animals and for using alternatives. Also, three attending scientists from the Ukraine, where institutions use hundreds of animals with no anaesthesia, were so excited about the program that they plan to hold a similar symposium in Kiev this year. Later, Wanda spoke to 300 veterinarians about spay/neuter programs and did three TV interviews publicising the alternatives in medical education.

RUSSIA

Their bodies painted like endangered cats, Canadian, U.S., and Russian PETA members protested outside the Moscow Fur Fair. News of the demo appeared in papers all over the world. SOUTH AFRICA

On 12 February 1999, at Thabazimbi Magistrates' Court, Northern Province, three men aged from 22 to 26 years of age were each sentenced to 29 years' gaol following charges of rhino poaching, house-breaking and theft; one of the four rhinos poached was heavily pregnant. The poaching is reported to have taken place in December 1997 on a farm in Thabazimbi and reported to the Endangered Species Protection Unit by the owner of the farm. The suspects were also accused of housebreaking and theft during this period, including theft of the weapons used to kill the rhinos.

SOUTH KOREA

A bill to legalise the sale of dog meat was temporarily withheld by South Korean lawmakers in May because of protests by animal protection groups, including International Aid for Korean Animals. The proposed amendment to livestock laws would subject the production and distribution of dog meat to government sanitation standards, and allow for the construction of dog slaughterhouses. The South Korean government banned the sale of dog meat in 1988 based on concerns about its international image during the Seoul Summer Olympics. However, the ban is not enforced and dog meat is openly sold and served in South Korea, where it is considered a delicacy that enhances sexual energy. To urge that the existing ban be preserved and vigorously enforced, contact President Kim Dae Jung, Blue House, 1 Saejong-Ro, Chongro-Ku, Seoul, South Korea, 110-760.

USA

Sears, Roebuck and Co. has responded to a barrage of complaints from PETA members and pulled its sponsorship of the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus. The decision to pull millions of advertising dollars comes after a disastrous year of animal-related incidents at Ringling, in which a baby elephant died after being forced to perform while seriously ill and a tiger was shot to death in his cage by a Ringling employee after attacking his trainer. The USDA is currently investigating claims made by two former circus employees that workers beat another Ringling baby elephant between performances.

When Kris Lampe and Lucy Shellon of California heard that a local church was bringing Circus Vargas to town, they showed a video about behind-the-scenes abuse in the circus to the church's business manager. The church agreed that the event would send the wrong message to children - and the circus was cancelled! The twosome then addressed the Azusa City Council about Circus Vargas' plans to perform on city-owned property. The council members voted to make this the last year the circus would be welcome in the city!

Colgate-Palmolive declared a moratorium on animal testing of its personal care products and their ingredients, effective March 25. People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals conducted a two-year open dialogue with Colgate to establish stronger animal care standards and a review committee to enforce the moratorium. The news follows a similar 1997 announcement by Gillette, whose entire product line is now produced without animal tests.

(Animals' Agenda, May/June '99)

On April 23, the Oregon Fish and Wildlife Commission unanimously approved a proposed rule to ban "canned hunts" of big game and exotic mammals. The ban, one of the strictest in the nation, forbids the shooting of animals in an enclosure of any size for a fee. Oregon joins California, Nevada, and Wyoming as western states that curtail canned hunts.

Virginia has become the fourth state to prohibit the killing of dogs and cats for their fur, and the sale of garments containing such fur. Additionally, animal cruelty has been given felony status after a diligent campaign led by the Virginia Beach SPCA showed the correlation between cruelty to animals and human violence. The General Assembly voted to make repeated acts of animal cruelty punishable by up to five years in jail. A similar measure was passed in New Mexico, going into effect on July 1st.

(Animals' Agenda, May/June '99)

Kroger Food Stores of Southern Illinois dropped its sponsorship of the Shrine Circus this year. The grocery chain received numerous complaints from animal advocates, including 85 petitions generated by a newspaper ad placed by a member of Illinois Animal Action targeting Kroger. Elsewhere, Shriners in Albuquerque have pledged to pursue an animal-free circus in 2000, after months of discussion with Animal Protection of New Mexico on animal welfare and public safety issues.

(Animals' Agenda, May/June '99)

The circus will not be coming to town in Alexandria, Virginia, since the city council voted to deny permission for the Clyde Beatty-Cole Brothers Circus to perform there. Although the company's marketing director asserts that its animals are treated humanely, Action for Animals and other local activists proved otherwise with photos and articles documenting abuse.

(Animals' Agenda, May/June '99)

The Maryland state assembly saved snapping turtles from agonising deaths by defeating a bill that would allow hook-and-line killing. This snaring method is extremely cruel, as turtles can hold their breath for up to six hours, and endure prolonged pain and anguish before drowning. Humane interests prevailed on the senate side, too, when legislators killed a bill to legalise the hunting of deer on Sundays.

Two California men have been charged under the state's Proposition 4 for illegally trapping beavers who were eating shrubbery at a Redding apartment complex. The initiative was passed last November, prohibiting the use of body-gripping traps except in specific instances when a special permit is required. The Haven Humane Society reported the violation after discovering a dog caught in one of the men's traps. The two face up to $2,000 in fines and a maximum one-year sentence.

Wild Oats, a U.S. natural foods store chain, now offers certified "turtle-safe" shrimp in its Colorado stores. Shrimp nets kill an estimated 155,000 turtles a year worldwide. Alfalfa's, another West Coast natural foods chain, plans to offer turtle-safe shrimp in all its stores that carry seafood.

A Vermont judge ruled to save the lives of two horses who had been willed by their deceased "owner" to be killed after his death. Letters from animal activists across the country, as well as a report submitted by In Defense of Animals, were cited as integral in Judge Susan Fowler's decision. This victory holds important ramifications, prompting Vermont state Senator, Vince Illuzzi to sponsor a bill to make it illegal to will the death of animals, and generally questioning the status of animals as property.

The Special Military Active Retired Travel Club (SMART) jettisoned its chicken-flying contest at its spring social in Shawnee, Oklahoma, due to the persuasive objections of United Poultry Concerns activists. A SMART representative affirmed that the group will not have "any sort of contests or games that involve any live animals."

For the fifteenth year in a row, activists everywhere marked the first day of spring by celebrating the Great American Meatout and asking people to "kick the meat habit" for a day. The Farm Animal Reform Movement, the event's national co-ordinator, reports that in more than 2,000 communities across the United States, local groups raised vegetarian awareness through lectures, marches, TV and radio interviews, education tables, and more. In Washington, D.C., FARM sponsored a vegan lunch for nearly 300 congressional employees on Capitol Hill, featuring an address by Rep. Tom Lantos, co-chair of the Congressional Friends of Animals Caucus. Governors of 12 states and mayors of 11 major cities issued official Meatout proclamations, and such celebrities as Casey Kasem, James Cromwell, and Mary Tyler Moore spoke out. Plans for Meatout 2000 are already in progress.

The U.S. Supreme Court recently rejected an appeal by the National Association for Biomedical Research that challenged a lower court's ruling in favour of the right of individuals to sue the government over the care of animals protected by federal law. Last September, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit found that animal advocate Marc Jurnove was personally affected by witnessing animals suffering in zoos, and therefore had legal standing to sue the U.S. Department of Agriculture for its failure to improve conditions. NABR's attempt to overturn that precedent-setting decision marks the latest twist in a case brought by the Animal Legal Defense Fund and four individuals in 1996 against the USDA for not implementing better animal care standards at research labs and zoos as called for under the Animal Welfare Act. Now that the plaintiffs' right to sue has been affirmed, the actual merits of the suit can be argued before the U.S. Court of Appeals.

Members of Seattle-based PCC Natural Markets convinced the co-op board that PCC should sell only cruelty-free beauty aids and household products. The co-op printed a brochure for customers, explaining that the determination of which products to carry was based on PETA's lists of companies that do and that don't test on animals.

Thanks to visitors who expressed concern for the animals held at the "I.Q. Zoo" in Scottsdale, Ariz., the cheap roadside attraction has closed. The "zoo" consisted of ducks, chickens and rabbits trained to perform silly tricks such as playing the piano with the drop of a coin or "dancing" on a rotating disk. The animals were confined in cramped, plexiglass cubes and forced to perform in order to obtain food.

The state legislatures of New York and Illinois have each approved bills to create a felony penalty for especially aggressive forms of cruelty to animals-and New York governor George Pataki has already signed the New York version into law. The Illinois version additionally provides that persons previously convicted of aggravated cruelty shall be charged with a felony for a repeated alleged offence. The New York legislature also voted to ban hunts of captive animals on properties of 10 acres or less, while the Illinois legislature passed a bill allowing students to opt out of classroom dissection. The New York legislature also passed A-1158, by assembly member Alexander B. Grannis, which if signed by Governor George Pataki would allow any city in the state to outlaw poisoning pigeons.

Mary Kay Cosmetics signed an agreement with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals pledging to end all animal tests as of April 22. The company had declared a moratorium in 1989, but it retained the option to test on animals in the future. The company also pledged to eliminate all animal ingredients from its product line. One of the world's largest cosmetics companies and the biggest to sign the agreement, Mary Kay's action marks the end of PETAs nearly 10-year effort against the Dallas-based company's testing policy.

Recent studies have shown a rise in vegetarianism and the popularity of soy food products. Food industry analysts U.S. Bancorp Piper Jaffray note that the market for meat alternatives in the United States is worth about $400 million and is expected to grow at least 30 percent annually. Soyatech, Inc., reported sales of soy products of $1 billion in 1998-a 400 percent increase from 1980.

Rocky Mountain Animal Defense has temporarily suspended a boycott of Celestial Seasonings products that began as a result of the company's poisoning of blackballed prairie dogs on its property in Boulder, Colorado. Representatives of both groups met on May 25, with Celestial Seasonings agreeing to demands and helping to draft a preliminary action plan for the tea company's future prairie dog management policy. Beyond its promises not to kill or relocate any more animals, Celestial Seasonings also established an Environmental Grant program offering financial backing and volunteer work to environmental groups, and will include information regarding the value of prairie dogs in its company tours and consumer relations efforts. RMAD was pleased with the negotiations, but will only lift the boycott permanently when the company pledges to ban all commercial development on its 35 acres.

The "They Are Not Our Property, We Are Not Their Owners" campaign, led by In Defense of Animals, has found its way into the Marin County (California) Animal Control ordinances. The campaign advocates a change in language-and therefore attitudes-to elevate the status of animals. With the help of the Marin Humane Society, the word "owner" will be replaced with "guardian" in all of the county's animal control laws.

The Iditarod is a gruelling long-distance dog sled race where several dogs are injured or even killed each year.

The U. S. Geological Survey is now using non-animal tests to gauge the environmental effects of chemical pollutants. With the Microtox BasicTest, a synthetic membrane device imitates the passage of chemicals through biological membranes; the test substance is then applied to a bacterium, whose natural luminescence indicates the chemical's degree of ecotoxicity. Genetic damage to the bacteria is gauged by another test, Mutatox. Developed by B. Thomas Johnson of Missouri's Columbia Environmental Research Centre, the system is said to be both inexpensive and efficient.

Many U.S. circuses are getting the red carpet pulled out from under them. The Lions Club in Santa Fe, New Mexico, has pledged to no longer sponsor any circus with animals; the Glen Oak Zoo in Peoria, Illinois, terminated its sponsorship of Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus; and Media Play in Middletown, New York, will no longer sell tickets to the Clyde Beatty-Cole Bros. Circus.

Following a meeting with People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, officials at the Environmental Protection Agency announced in late April that the EPA would require fewer animals for the testing of 3,000 "high production volume" chemicals, many of which have already been known for years to be harmful. EPA officials agreed to allow alternatives to animal-based genetic toxicity tests, thus sparing up to 95,000 animals, and to no longer require terrestrial toxicity studies that involved poisoning birds.

A major primate research laboratory accused of mistreating its 650 chimpanzees is being forced to give up 300 of the animals and improve its staff and facilities. Under a settlement announced this summer by the Agriculture Department (USDA), The Coulston Foundation of Alamogordo, N.M., agreed to undergo review by a panel of experts and will be barred from acquiring any additional chimps without government approval. USDA listed 22 violations of a federal animal welfare law, including the case of a chimpanzee named "Echo" in which lab personnel "undertook an extensive surgical procedure under inappropriate conditions." Three other animals died unnecessarily because the lab staff were unaware of the side effects and complications of pharmaceutical compounds that were administered, USDA said. Inspectors also said the lab's housing inadequate, lacking among other things a proper system for disposing of animal and food wastes. Animal rights activists have been complaining about Coulston for years, accusing the lab of negligence in the death of several chimps. In 1996, without admitting wrongdoing, Coulston settled USDA allegations of animal care violations that occurred in 1993 when three chimps died. "The stunning terms of this settlement are truly

U.S. Plan World War on Feral Wildlife

Representatives of the 175 nations that have endorsed the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity - including the US - are to assemble in Nairobi, Kenya, in May 2000 to draft guidelines for purging and blocking the spread of alleged invasive species. The guidelines are to be presented for ratification by the CBD members in 2001. Once ratified, they could constitute a global mandate in support of the forthcoming recommendations of the cabinet-level Invasive Species Council created by the U.S. President Bill Clinton on February 2, under orders to "mobilise the federal government to defend against aggressive predators and pests." The mobilisation is to be underway by August 2000.

The definition of "aggressive predators and pests" addressed by both the CBD and Invasive Species Council could include, among many other species, feral cats, feral pigs, street pigeons, starlings, the parrot colonies of San Francisco, Florida and the New York City metropolitan area, and wild horses. Species likely to be targeted in Japan include racoons, weasels, marten, common mongooses, and black bass. The announcement came two weeks after the Japan Environment Agency announced a plan to cull 250 of the 300 native Sika deer in the Odaigahara highlands, to protect an ancient spruce forest from bark nibbling.

"This is the first time the Environment Agency has decided to preserve an ecosystem by killing wild animals", quoted the South China Morning Post. Virtually ignored by the US and Canadian media, and by the international humane community, the Subsidiary Body on Scientific, Technical and Technological Advice, has been planning a world-wide war on non-native animals and plants since May 1998, when it adopted "Decision IV/1.C on alien species that threaten ecosystems, habitats or species."

unparalleled in the history of the Animal Welfare Act," said Elliot Katz, president of In Defense of Animals. "Never before has a research laboratory been forced to surrender almost half its animals, essentially stop acquiring and breeding chimpanzees for years, and submit to both outside animal care monitoring as well as an independent compliance official," Katz said. In agreeing to the settlement, Coulston did not admit to any violations. But the foundation will have to pay a $100,000 fine if it fails to comply with the settlement. The lab must place 150 of its animals by the end of next year and the remaining 150 by 2002. Earlier this year, the Department of Health and Human Services put restrictions on the lab's handling of animals used in agency sponsored projects. Among other things, the lab was required to file quarterly reports on its efforts to find appropriate staff.

Correction to paragraph eight : Selective breeding...

The twentieth century has seen a number of attempts to apply animal breeding techniques to humans, as promoted by the eugenics movement. Forced sterilisation and other efforts have been applied to stop the 'unfit' and disabled from breeding. While this was applied with the most ruthless determination in Nazi Germany, eugenics programmes have also been implemented in social democratic Sweden and elsewhere...

Battery Bunnies - Hell on Earth!

The plight of the battery farmed rabbit, reared for its meat/fur, has become a topic for public discussion following recent exposure in the media. There are estimated to be 500 intensive rabbit farms "growing" meat rabbits in the UK at present. The majority of the carcasses are exported to the continent, the taste for rabbit meat never having taken off in this country. Whilst Sainsbury's and Waitrose do stock farmed rabbit meat, lack of consumer demand renders it relatively hard to come by. The industry is falsely promoted as being an easy, lucrative money-spinner, suitable for inexperienced people with spare time and a small amount of capital available. Several of the larger, established, successful units offer supervised visits for potential rabbit farmers and provide "starter packs", which include cages and breeding stock. Lacking the necessary knowledge and skills it's hardly surprising that these new businesses usually collapse within 18 months of setting up.

The living horror, to which battery bunnies are subjected, was recently revealed during an undercover investigation. Hundreds of white rabbits crammed into small, barren, wire-mesh cages were discovered housed in an old poultry-style shed at a unit in East Yorkshire. The shed was in complete darkness. The sound of rabbits jostling penetrated the loud, constant, incessant noise of the ventilation system. Kept up to 12 to a cage, measuring less than 3' x 2' and 16" high, rabbits scrambled over one another in an attempt to reach the cage's sole source of water. The stench of ammonia was overpowering and huge mounds of faeces were piled high beneath the rows of suspended cages.

Immediately outside the single shed numerous dead rabbits were found dumped, their bodies at various stages of decomposition; some crawling with scavenger beetles, visibly feeding on the maggots within. Chosen at random for the purposes of an investigation, there is no reason to believe conditions discovered at this unit differ from any other.

Battery farmed rabbits never experience sunshine or fresh air, neither do they have the opportunity to properly exhibit natural behaviour such as hopping, play and digging. Given the choice, rabbits, including farmed ones, will engage in such activity; these traits have by no means been bred out of them. Scientific research has shown that rabbits are unable to adapt to small battery-style cages since they cannot perform normal movements (i.e. hopping and jumping) which can lead to irreversible physiological damage. The life-span of a rabbit bred for its meat/fur is usually 12 weeks. Prior to electrical stunning, decapitation and bleeding, the rabbits are transported to the UK's sole slaughterhouse, Woldsway Foods Ltd., located in Ashby-by-Partney, Lincolnshire. Whilst British farmed rabbit is not live exported, suffering during transportation to slaughter is immense - crammed into unsuitable containers and driven from one pick-up site to another, the terrifying ordeal may be exacerbated by overnight holding until slaughter.

Increasingly, new intensive rabbit units are popping up around the country. Whilst many consist of utilising poultry type units, others involve the prospective farmer applying to the local council for planning permission to convert an existing building / erect a purpose built structure. A campaign designed to mobilise local opposition at this stage, specifically focusing on objecting to the planning, can realistically prevent the venture ever setting up. The North East Animal Rights Coalition has been concentrating their efforts on a proposed farm near Hull. Mass leafleting of local villages and a series of peaceful theme demos has resulted in extensive local support and the issue being highlighted/debated thoroughly in the media.

Curiously, coinciding with the issuing of a press release detailing a connected protest, the British Commercial Rabbit Association cancelled their Annual General Meeting, last minute, in mid-October. If their intention was to avoid adverse publicity, bringing their industry under scrutiny, then the BCRA was unsuccessful. The planned, lively protest moved from the anticipated meeting location to the nearby showpiece rabbit unit and the issue was well aired regionally in the media. On the fur front, those designer stores who attempt to justify selling real fur because it is "only rabbit trim" are scurrying to remove the items from their shelves at the first glimpse of protesters waving photos displaying conditions in which they are kept. The rabbit is, after all, one of Britain's most popular "pets" and few people want to be connected to condoning cruelty to them.

Anyone requiring copies of photographs/video footage of the aforementioned investigation for campaigning purposes, please get in touch. If you have info of a proposed/existing intensive rabbit unit or require more info about the issue, please write to:

Newcastle Animal Rights Coalition News

Regular local demos concerning a variety of issues take place. During the months when performing animal circuses visit the region, twice-daily demos take place, as we tour alongside them. Nat West demos and info stalls happen on a weekly basis. Pigeon/gull culls are taken on as and when they arise. The city's design stores are regularly patrolled to ensure Newcastle is kept fur-free. NARC liaises with store management to obtain permanent anti-fur policies when possible and protests to achieve such when necessary. Close connections are maintained with the National Anti-Hunt Campaign, as high profile actions concerning John Lewis Partnership (pheasant shooting) continue. In addition, national days of action are observed and regional/national demos attended. NARC engages in lawful, undercover investigations and opposes (in)appropriate planning applications.

Cornhyhaugh Fur Campaign

This is an intensive, well-established, local campaign with the ultimate aim of closing down the Northumberland mink farm. Emphasis is placed on local support and highlighting the existence of the farm through publicity actions. Peaceful demos happen several times a week. Undercover investigations are undertaken regularly, combined with all-round monitoring of the farm to expose illegalities (a formal caution was recently issued to the farmer, as a result of CFC footage). Pressure has been maintained to encourage the Government to ban mink farming. We co-ordinate our efforts with the Coalition to Abolish the Fur Trade and other national anti-fur organisations.

North East Animal Rights Coalition

Campaigns against intensive, commercial meat rabbit farming. They concentrate on stopping new farms setting up. Regular, peaceful demos are held at Market Weighton, East Yorkshire. Protests are held at a unit in Bainton, nr. Driffield.

They incorporate investigations, liaising with relevant authorities and seeking to achieve legislative change and more stringent enforcement of current welfare laws. They are trying to network with other individuals/groups with similar interests.

The Friends of the Great North Wood

The Friends of the Great North Wood were established in 1992, mainly as a response to the various threats to the local woodlands during the 1980s, and a growing awareness to their value to both wildlife and the people of central south London. Despite the name Norwood, by the mid-1950s the Great North Wood had disappeared off the maps, and in most people's minds. These isolated woodland parcels that remained were largely ignored, closed to the public or treated as simply another municipal park; their rich cultural and ecological ancestry had been destroyed, damaged or apparently forgotten. With the Great North Wood area falling within 5 London boroughs after 1965 - Croydon, Southwark, Lewisham, Lambeth and Bromley - and the addition of the Greater London Council until 1986, together with some private owners, the tendency to diverge from common paths and goals increased.

As we enter a new millennium, there is now an ideal opportunity for the Great North Woods strategy. That involves the five boroughs, The Dulwich Estate, Railtrack, London Wildlife Trust and Friends of the Great North Wood. It would identify the primary aims and objectives for management in the woods within a defined historical boundary; protect, conserve and promote their cultural and ecological interest; seek to resolve potential conflicts of interest; identify areas for increasing woodland cover; and identify and correlate resources in order to achieve these aims.

Friends of the Great North Wood produce a newsletter: 'The Wood Warbler'. Subscription costs £5 a year (£3 for concessions).

NEWS AND VIEWS from the ANIMAL LIBERATION FRONT PRESS OFFICE

A BATTLE WON...

Of course, the brilliant success of the Hillgrove campaign is the latest victory to celebrate following Consort Beagles, Hylyne Rabbits and all the others over the years. From the ALF raids nearly twenty years ago against Brown's evil business through all the pickets, demos and attacks to the final determined, well-organised push by 'Save the Hillgrove Cats'.

The only ones not deserving of praise are the RSPCA. Having said all along that there was nothing wrong at Hillgrove, then jumping on the bandwagon as a leading player, our Royal Society for the Promotion (oh, sorry, should that be "Prevention"?) of Cruelty to Animals once again displays its hypocrisy.

Again, this is a brilliant victory. A victory won by each and every one of you out there - the 'grass roots'. A battle won, but the war goes on...

HAVE NO TRUCK(S) WITH ARSON

During the long night following the final national demo at Hillgrove Farm, two arson attacks were carried out on trucks used in animal abuse industries. Four vehicles were destroyed at Tadmartin Poultry in Banbury with no less than seventeen being accounted for just half-an-hour later at the Oxford depot of Unigate Dairies. Police are also trying to establish links with the attack last May at Weddel Swift Meats near Exeter, which took out one lorry and badly damaged two others.

All these attacks received wide publicity, including national coverage in newspapers and on radio and TV, with this press office highlighting the terrible cruelties of the dairy industry and its direct responsibility for the veal trade (no milk = no calf).

But something you may not have heard about... Late on the night of Saturday 18th September an equally newsworthy attack which left seven refrigerated lorries, valued at around £70,000 each, completely gutted where they were parked at Cherryfield (Croydon) Ltd... coyly described as a "pig processing plant" ... received almost no flaming publicity at all! In view of the vast coverage afforded the previous incidents it seems rather odd that the only reports were in the local weeklies 'Croydon Advertiser' and 'Croydon Guardian'.

Are the authorities once again trying to deny the radical wing of our movement the "oxygen of publicity" by refusing to acknowledge its existence? I'm not really allowed personal comment on actions in case it's interpreted as 'incitement' but a detective from South Norwood CID described the Croydon attack as being "a professional job." As activists continue to explain, the actions speak for themselves whether they are publicised or not.

THE ALF CONTINUES TO HAVE SMASHING TIMES

Just in case you think the ALF is only doing high-profile arson attacks, here's a sample from the Essex area late August and early September: Halal meat delivery van paint stripped, tyres slashed, sprayed with slogans ... two butchers shops' windows smashed, sprayed ... two betting shops windows smashed, sprayed ... three butchers shops windows smashed, locks glued, sprayed ... leather/fur shop window smashed, damaging substance (no, I can't say what it was!) squirted on coats through security grill, locks glued, sprayed ... butchers shop window smashed, shutter glued and sprayed ... two fishing tackle shops windows smashed, locks glued, sprayed ... drains blocked causing flooding in Burger King, Wimpy, Kentucky Fried Chicken and two branches of McDonald's ... fur/leather shop windows smashed, sprayed ... McDonald's, Burger King and KFC in Southend High Street all sprayed, front and rear doors glued ... two butchers shops glued, sprayed and attacked with glass paint and etching fluid, three more had windows smashed, sprayed with a sixth glued shutters, sprayed and nearby dog faeces relocated to window display shelves ... fur/leather shop attacked for the third time during the 4 1/2-week period, paint-bombed, sprayed and shutter switch glued. So you see, that's from one local ALF group either based in Essex or travelling there from a safe haven (who knows?). Multiply that up and down the country and the scale of too-often unreported activity becomes apparent. And let's not forget the focus of all this activity, the animal victims themselves...

SIX HUNDRED INDIVIDUALS TASTE FREEDOM

ALF activists raided Hall's of Darley Oaks, Newchurch, near Burton upon Trent, on the night of Thursday 2nd September to liberate 600 guinea pigs destined for vivisection laboratories. Also obtaining documents, still photographs and video footage during the raid they said it was to "kickstart the campaign" against the breeding unit. Entering a building so new that the alarm had not yet been wired up the activists found thousands of guinea pigs in overcrowded, barren conditions with no bedding or nesting materials. Many dead and dying babies were observed on a thick layer of faeces with seized documents showing daily mortality rates in the hundreds.

All six hundred liberated individuals are now in caring homes to live out their lives in peace. Meanwhile, a campaign to close down Hall's breeding business has been launched. For further information contact 'Save the Newchurch Guinea Pigs Campaign', PO Box 74, Evesham, Worcestershire, WR11 5 WF (Tel: 01 902 564 734).

WHAT NEXT FOR THE PRESS OFFICE?

Channel 4's odious 'Dispatches' programme by burglar and con-man Graham Hall which was intended to discredit Barry Horne, myself and the animal liberation movement in general has finally hit the buffers. Following the screening last December the unedited footage was seized by no less than the Hampshire Loonies. Knowing what it would show I had no real concern apart from the possibility of yet more unwarranted hassle. A mere ten months later it seems that Hampshire are taking no action against me. It begs the question... Was this the latest failed attempt by the Hampshire police to get me locked up? Surely not...

Meanwhile there have been a couple of minor annoyances. A nice police officer (is there such a creature?) at a Harlan demo arrested me for failing to identify myself when I laughed about him obviously following me. An inspector de-arrested me about twenty minutes later following ridicule from the protesters. The final national demo at Hillgrove saw me arrested for "leading an unlawful assembly". Unlawful or not, the assembly was there when I arrived so how could I have led them? When I answered to bail over a month later I was charged with breach of a section 14 order (leaving Dry Lane and making my way quite openly to Witney town centre) and obstructing the highway (shouting "Close down Hillgrove Farm" through a loudhailer). Well, the latter incident seems to have worked, I should have done it years ago! Now I've probably got a contract out on me from all those who worked so hard on the 'Save the Hillgrove Cats Campaign'. Come on, can't you take a joke (smile!)?

FAREWELL TO A GREAT CAMPAIGNER

Many of you will remember Sue Croshaw who founded Disabled Against Animal Research and Exploitation (DAARE). Sadly, Sue went to rest earlier this year having concentrated more in recent times on rights for the physically disadvantaged. That said, she never lost her compassion for all life and never lost her sense of humour ... a gift so desperately required when facing the horrors of animal abuse on top of the unkindnesses already visited upon her by Life.

One indication of her impact on the animal liberation scene was when the success of DAARE forced the Research Defence Society to create Seriously Ill for Medical Research in the guise of the obnoxious Andrew Blake. On a scale of compassion, humanity and selflessness Sue was all that Andrew Blake could never be, and it showed. It showed so very, very clearly. Sue may have left the battle zone but her spirit will be a force for a long time to come.

FUR - THE FINANCIAL IMPACT

The ALF gets mentioned in many places, not least in the Financial Times, albeit infrequently. The latest indication that liberation and economic sabotage really does affect the world of big business comes in a report on the fur trade by Clare MacCarthy, 19th October edition. Quotes follow:

"Scandinavian fur breeders, wholesalers and retailers cannot afford to be complacent ... anti-fur protesters are increasing their activities, releasing farmed mink into the wild and smashing the windows of Copenhagen furriers. In July, members of the Animal Liberation Front claimed responsibility for freeing some 6,000 mink at a farm in North Jutland. And one central Copenhagen fur shop ... is considering closing because of repeated window-smashing and red paint-daubing episodes. The fur industry takes such actions very seriously and the Danish fur-breeders association responded to the July mink farm raid with a nine-page press release". So now you know.

GOVERNMENT PROMISES = GUT-WRENCHING PERFDY

Yes, we all know that the media trumpeted that New Labour had outlawed animal testing of cosmetics and, subsequently, the testing of cosmetic ingredients. Those of us who read the reports with care realised that the cosmetics companies had relinquished their Home Office Licences voluntarily and that "this Government" would not issue new licences. What about the next Government, or the next, or the next?

That's right, spin doctors at work. In the same way that veal crates and sow stalls were outlawed but individual pigs and calves could still be transported in abominable conditions to other countries only to be reared in the systems outlawed by the UK and then their dead bodies re-imported for the delight of those who enjoy cannibalism-one-step-removed.

Sadly, the New Labour spin doctors seem to have even conned that fine campaigning group PETA! I know PETA do good work, I know PETA don't slag off the ALF, I know PETA don't toe the Establishment line... BUT, that doesn't mean that PETA can't sometimes be fooled, just like the rest of us!

In the latest edition of PETA's 'Animal Times' there is an article about Procter and Gamble's evil, indefensible animal tests. The same pages show a photograph of Tony Blair smiling (what else?) with the comment "Britain has banned the use of animals to test cosmetics and cosmetics ingredients. In Britain, Procter and Gamble would be facing criminal charges for their torturous tests."

Sadly, that's not the case. The famous brochure 'New Labour, New Life for Animals' has been replaced by the infamous, albeit fictional, 'New Labour, New Lies for Animals'. Blair and his spin doctor-run government haven't just reneged upon their promises, they haven't just conned the electorate ... what they've done is much, much worse. They've condemned countless numbers of our brothers and sisters of other species to torture, to degradation and to death. Government has failed, the law has failed, justice has failed. What else is left? Please direct all enquiries to the Rt Hon Tony "Trust Me" Blair MP, 10 Downing Street ...

THE HUNTING DEBATE

Is it really worth taking up space to decry the bloodsports lobby? We all know they're wrong, so terribly wrong. But they do have the media's attention. How representative is the Countryside Alliance? I'm concerned about my village post office, the (lack of) public transport and government neglect of rural areas. That means I could have gone on their over-subscribed, over-subsidised, over-hyped protests. My extended family includes gamekeepers and terriermen. I am a country dweller.

I know about bloodsports. I know about country ways. I know about the rural economy. I am also unequivocally opposed to hunting with hounds and all the other barbarities promoted and protected by the Countryside Alliance. So are the vast majority of my rural neighbours. Just because they have the finances to transport people to their pernicious protests doesn't mean they're going to win. Blair and his cronies must keep their pre-election promises otherwise democracy is dead!

ONWARD, EVER ONWARD

Hillgrove Farm and its predecessors have gone. That still leaves Shamrock Farm, Harlan, Bantin and Kingman, HLS and all the other areas of animal abuse ... farming, circuses, fur trade ... need I go on? We must continue the fight. We must redouble our efforts. We must draw strength from each other and from our still-incarcerated brothers and sisters. We have but one enemy and that enemy is animal abuse in all its vile forms. Join together, end the debates about tactics and methods. While we argue the innocent die. Let us work together towards a compassionate world, a gentler world, a vegan world. Come on, we can do it. Let's go forward together to our dream ... animal liberation.

Second International Day for Animal Rights

Last year we launched the Universal Declaration of Animal Rights to coincide with the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Like last year, we are again calling on all animal rights advocates to hold candlelit vigils on or around December 10th at locations where the rights of animals are abused - where they suffer pain and death. The media seemed to like this visual aspect, and its connection with human rights protests. In view of political and legal developments towards recognising rights for great apes, it may make political sense, wherever possible, to conduct vigils and pickets at primate laboratories or breeding centres.

By continuing to make the connection between human rights and animal rights, we can demonstrate that the two concepts are not only compatible, but are intrinsically linked. I think it also conveys the notion of animal rights being the next step along the road of moral progress, building on a growing recognition of human rights.

News from Greyhound Action

Campaigning for the abolition of greyhound racing and educating the public not to support it!

More Than 30,000?

From looking at the latest figures released by the British and Irish greyhound racing authorities, the number of greyhounds disposed of annually by the greyhound racing industry in the British Isles could be far more than the 30,000 claimed by Greyhound Action.

Figures for last year show that about 20,000 greyhounds were registered in Ireland and 5,383 in Britain. They also show that about 4,500 greyhound litters were born in Ireland and 657 in Britain. Ireland is a big breeding centre for greyhounds, with many thousands registered there being exported to Britain to race. For every greyhound that enters racing, another will be deemed "surplus to requirements" in order to make room for the new influx. So 25,000 in means 25,000 out.

The Irish authorities only give approximate figures, but those figures are nevertheless extremely worrying. Greyhounds in general have large litters, usually comprising at least 8 puppies. But the Irish figures show that, on average, only between 4 and 5 puppies per litter are being registered. This makes a shortfall of about 16,000 puppies. Greyhounds are normally registered at about 3 months old. Are thousands being got rid of in Ireland before even reaching that young age? If so, the number of greyhounds disposed of could be well over 40,000 every year.

New Canterbury Stadium Proposed

At present greyhound racing takes place in Canterbury at a stadium owned by the local football club. Plans are afoot to move the football club to a new arena to be built in Sturry Road as their present stadium is due to be redeveloped - and both the city council and the football club are keen to incorporate dog racing into the new arena.

If we can change their minds it will mean the end of greyhound racing in Canterbury. So it is important that as many people as possible write to the council and the football club to point out the cruelty and mass slaughter of dogs inherent in the greyhound racing industry (full info on this available from Greyhound Action, if you don't have it already). Also tell them that the movement against greyhound racing is growing rapidly and there are likely to be frequent demonstrations at the new stadium should greyhound racing move there.

Malcolm Burgess,
City Estates and Leisure Officer, Canterbury City Council, Military Road, Canterbury, Kent, CT1 1YW

Plans for Swedish Greyhound Racing

There is currently only one greyhound track in Sweden, but no betting is allowed and dogs are raced there more or less as a hobby. Things could get much worse though, as there are plans to create three more tracks (in Stockholm, Gothenburg and Landskrona) where betting will be permitted. It is important that these proposals are nipped in the bud, before a large-scale greyhound racing industry becomes established in Sweden, with all the death and suffering which that involves. Please write to the following addresses telling them what's wrong with greyhound racing and asking them not to open the proposed dog tracks. It's important to point out that, although it's only 3 tracks (at the moment) compared to 61 currently operating in Britain, the population of Sweden (9 million) is 7 times smaller, so there will be far fewer homes available for ex-racing greyhounds.

Greyhound Awareness Week

The response to this year's Greyhound Awareness Week was extremely pleasing, with about 80 local animal protection groups taking part, making it at least four times bigger than last year's event. All over the country campaigners set up street stalls to educate the public about the death and suffering caused to greyhounds by the greyhound racing industry and thousands of signatures were obtained for our petition to abolish greyhound racing, with almost 30,000 leaflets being distributed. There were demos outside several greyhound stadiums, including Canterbury, Hove, Poole, Portsmouth, Swansea and Walthamstow, and a great deal of local and regional media attention.

There is not enough space to individually name all the local groups and individual campaigners who took part, but we can say that there were stalls and/or other activities in Berks, Cambs, Devon, Dorset, Dublin, Dyfed, Essex, Glos, Glamorgan, Grampian, Hants, Herefords, Herts, Kent, Leics, Lincs, London, Manchester, Middx, Norfolk, Strathclyde, Suffolk, Surrey, Sussex, Wilts, Worcs, and Yorks (our apologies to any we've left out!). We also put several interested groups and individuals from the USA in touch with the Greyhound Protection League over there. Many, many thanks to all those who took part!

Until Next Year

Next year's Greyhound Awareness Week will take place from May 20th - 27th, and we'll be hoping to make it even bigger than this year's. In the meantime there is still plenty that can be done to support the campaign against greyhound racing. If you would like to do a street stall, demonstration, or just write a letter to the local media about the dark side of greyhound racing, don't hesitate to contact Greyhound Action for leaflets, posters, petition forms and information.

Greyhound Stadiums

The following places have greyhound stadiums:

Auchinleck (Ayrshire), Ayr, Bargoed, Blyth, Bolton, Bury St. Edmunds, Caister on Sea (Yarmouth), Canterbury, Carfin, Castleford, Catford (London), Chesterfield, Chester-le-Street, Crayford (Kent), Doncaster (2 tracks), Durham, Easington, Ellesmere Port, Gorton (Manchester), Gretna, Hall Green (Birmingham), Harlow, Hawick, Henlow Camp (Beds), HInckley, Hove, Hoddesdon, Hull, Leamington, Milton Keynes, Newcastle under Lyme, Newcastle upon Tyne, Newton Abbot, Nottingham, Oxford, Perry Barr (Birmingham), Peterborough, Pontefract, Poole, Portsmouth, Reading, Romford, Rotherham, Rutherglen (Glasgow), Sheffield, Sittingbourne, St. Helens, Sterling, Swansea, Thornton (Fife), Sunderland, Swaffham, Swindon, Walthamstow (London), West Lothian, Wimbledon (London), Wisbech, Wishaw, Wolverhampton, Workington. (Full addresses available from Greyhound Action).

If you live near any of these tracks, why not start a campaign to close it down?

Most greyhound tracks are not vastly profitable, so a reduction in attendance, or in firms sponsoring races, could easily cause them to fold. Public education is the key. Many people who attend greyhound racing and many firms who sponsor it would not do so if they knew about the sad plight of the dogs. Demos, street stalls and letters in the local papers are all ways you can spread that information.

Contact Greyhound Action if you need help and advice in setting up a campaign.

Evening Chronicle Article

The death and suffering caused by the greyhound racing industry made front-page headlines in the Evening Chronicle newspaper (which covers Newcastle and the North East of England) on August 28th. The article, entitled "A Race to the Death" also took up the centre spread of the newspaper and came about as a result of information supplied to Evening Chronicle reporters by Greyhound Action and local animal rights campaigners and sanctuary workers. Just over a week later, Greyhound Action representative Tony Peters took part in a BBC Radio Newcastle programme prompted by the article, in which he was able to explain why greyhound racing should be banned. If anyone is interested in reading the Evening Chronicle article, Greyhound Action can supply a photocopy on request.

News from Italy - your help is needed!

The greyhound track in Naples has closed as a result of a new law restricting betting and rescue charity Greyhounds in Need is in the process of finding homes for the 300 dogs that were involved in racing there. Meanwhile, a proposal to open a new greyhound track in Cattolica, near Rimini, is being fought by local animal rights campaigners with help from Greyhound Action. You can help the campaign by writing to/faxing the Italian politicians listed below, as soon as possible, asking that they do all they can to prevent the building of the proposed greyhound track in Cattolica. Point out that greyhound racing in other countries, including the UK and USA, has led to a massive problem of unwanted greyhounds that are no longer required for racing. These dogs either end up being killed, often by cruel methods, or are just abandoned - and this has led to greyhound racing being banned in six American states since 1993 on animal welfare grounds. Italy already has a big problem with stray and unwanted dogs, and any increase in greyhound racing there will only add to this.

Herbal Roots

- a Potted History of Herbal Medicine

The original diet on which the human body evolved had no 'improved crops', only wild plants. There was no distinction between food and medicine. Humans ate instinctively. As agriculture developed people retained the intuitive knowledge of seeking certain plants at certain times and for certain conditions. Later, as intuition waned, this became an oral tradition, part and parcel of the folk-law held by the common people across the earth. The day to day medical needs of the family were catered for by the ordinary people as is still the case for 90% of the earth's population, the elders, witches, healers and shamen were those who carried on a more intense mix of herbalism, religion, superstition and ritual.

The rise of an educated elite in Europe, with a class separation from the ordinary farming, working people, led to academic medicine in universities based on theoretical ideas selectively interpreted from the ancient Greek writers, divorced from the received wisdom of the common people of their own lands. This was the beginning of modern orthodox medicine - without basis in traditional herbal medicine, which was rejected on theoretical rather than practical grounds as 'unimportant'.

Centuries of barbarous experimentation on the sick took place, administering terrible chemical poisons, cutting up and maiming bodies to satisfy academic curiosity. The new 'civilised' medicine became the authority, and despite the continued practice by ordinary country people of herbal medicine the oral tradition waned as the youth considered it old fashioned and 'unscientific'. So bad became the persecution of herbalists that King Henry VIII granted them protection to practice in law, which remains on the statute books despite many attempts to have it removed. Today we hear reporters saying, "There really may be something in the old-wives-tale about comfrey being good for fractures, as scientists discover that it contains a chemical that increases bone regeneration!" - a clear indication of the demise in the standing of folk-medicine. The reporter's words dismiss and diminish its significance while laying emphasis on the superiority of the scientist.

The World Health Organisation, aiming to bring health to all people on earth by the year 2000, has made a clear statement about the essential need to preserve traditional folk medicines in all societies. In 1992, it declared, "...the proper use of medicinal plants is a necessity, not a luxury," and has developed programmes to aid local medical customs in many countries. In the west we assume that such statements only apply to developing countries, and so our own folk medicine continues to be marginalised. Yet modern herbalists are aware that they maintain a link with our body's original nature. For the herbalist this explains the sublime efficacy of the medicines they use.

A Touch of Vegan Therapy

by Julie Rosenfield

So what do I mean by Vegan Therapy? I'm glad you asked! Well, obviously there are many of vegan therapies around, but in my case, I'm talking in particular about aromatherapy, massage, reflexology and healing which I believe are excellent for vegans.

But first, a little about my background. Last year, I decided to turn my life around completely. I was fortunate enough to work as a PA in the television industry for many years during which time I met a great number of famous people but after much soul searching and the famous "mid-life crisis", I gave it all up to train to become a holistic therapist.

Working in television can be very exciting but it is also a very stressful industry. I saw at first hand the damage that people around me were doing to their health with the combination of working long hours, stress, smoking, drinking and a meat-based diet. I longed to tell people how they could improve their health by adopting a vegan diet, taking more exercise, learning relaxation techniques etc, but the more I told them, the more they laughed! Often the people who laughed the most at my vegan diet were the ones who had the poorest health in terms of high cholesterol, high blood pressure - not so funny really!

I realised that the only way I could really help people and be taken a bit more seriously was by going back to college and consequently took a one year full-time course in holistic therapies. So you could say that in the space of a year I went from rubbing shoulders with the famous to rubbing the arms, legs, and backs of the not-so-famous-but-loveable-nonetheless!

Even at college, however, all was not plain sailing for myself as the only vegan in a group of 18. Inevitably, we had to study anatomy and physiology as this was an important part of the course. Early on in my studies, I was somewhat perturbed that when covering the topic of the human liver, the teacher suggested she bring in a chicken liver the following week for us to look at. She suggested that anyone who didn't want to do so could sit outside in the corridor. This brought back many unpleasant memories of having to sit out of biology lessons at school and I did briefly wonder whether I had done the right thing after all. Luckily, she realised in the end that this could be difficult for some students and happily the threatened animal organ never materialised!

I was also expecting a difficult time over the nutrition class. Here however, I happened on a stroke of great fortune in that we had a new teacher who was a vegetarian. She was only too happy for me to bring in vegan recipes to the class and do my project on a vegan diet! I have heard that vegan students in previous years were not so lucky!

Anyway, I'm happy to say that I passed the course and am now qualified to be let loose on the general public but especially, I hope, vegans. With this in mind, I have set up my own practice called Healing Touch where I will be offering the following vegan therapies. Like most of the alternative or complementary therapies, they are holistic, meaning that they work on the mind, body and spirit, and, if used, by a vegan practitioner contain no animal ingredients.

AROMATHERAPY

Aromatherapy is a wonderful therapy, which combines the use of essential oils with massage. The oils are extracted from herbs, plants, flowers etc. Some well-known ones include lavender, camomile, rosemary etc but there are many others. Aromatherapy is great for promoting relaxation and vitality and can be used to treat a whole range of symptoms such as stress-related conditions, asthma, digestive problems, headaches etc. The oils can also be used in the bath, as inhalations or in aroma-burners.

However, there is a potential difficulty for vegans. Some of the methods used to extract certain oils such as rose or jasmine employ processes known as enfleurage or maceration. Both methods can involve the use of beef suet and lard to collect the oils, either by spreading them on a sheet of glass in the case of enfleurage, or by plunging the oils into hot fat in the case of maceration! For this reason, all the oils I shall be offering in my practice or for purchase, both organic and non-organic, will be from product ranges which bear the Vegan Society logo or are certified vegan. This is certainly a good reason why it is good to consult a vegan aromatherapist if possible.

It is advisable to consult a practitioner rather than to try the oils out without knowing how to use them because some of the oils can have side effects for certain medical conditions and others need to be avoided during pregnancy. For this reason, a full medical consultation is always taken before proceeding with any treatment.

Aromatherapy leaves you feeling great and smelling wonderful -just the thing after a hard day's hunt-sabbing or a very muddy demo!

REFLEXOLOGY

Reflexology is a very old form of therapy - pictures of it even appear in the tombs of the Ancient Egyptians. It works on the principle that there are reflex points in the soles of the feet which correspond to different parts of the body. When the thumbs and the fingers of the therapist stimulate these reflex points, energy blockages can be released leading to better health. It is very good for a variety of conditions including headaches, asthma, digestive disturbances, PMT, stress etc. It is generally ok for vegans but please check that your therapist is using a vegan product to clean the soles of your feet as well as a vegan - and preferably talc-free - talcum powder!

This is the one great chance as a vegan therapist I get to play my favourite game with people's toes - the vegan version being "This Little Figgy went to Market"!

SWEDISH FULL BODY MASSAGE

This is always the one that gets people talking! And it can be a bit tricky to advertise - especially in public phone boxes. Seriously though, there's nothing dubious about it at all. It's Swedish because it was invented by a Swedish physiologist Per-Henrik Ling in the early 19th century and - in case you're wondering - the body massage isn't that full - there are certain parts that this therapy definitely doesn't reach!!

The word massage actually comes from the Arabic word 'mass' or 'mash', meaning to press softly. Massage is excellent for working on the muscles and can help all kinds of muscular aches and pains, improve circulation, break up areas of cellulite, increase mobility of the joints and can be used for general relaxation and stimulation of the muscles and nerves.

Again, it is important to check that the therapist is using a vegan kind of massage oil. Some of the massage oils at college had some very questionable ingredients - I always prefer to use something more natural like sweet almond oil.

HEALING

At least, with healing, there are no products involved so there is no reason for vegans to be wary. For people who are new and unsure of healing, it is merely a question of sitting down quietly in a room with some relaxing music, and closing your eyes, while the healer moves their hands around you. You don't even feel them, as they don't actually touch you. Instead they work on an invisible body of energy around a person known as the aura. Healing is wonderful for very many conditions and does not require any religious belief or effort on the part of the patient. It is excellent for relaxation and is not costly as many healers offer their services on a donation-only basis. It's good to have a vegan healer if possible though - as they have great vibes and less karma!!

If you'd like to know more about how I can help you with any of the above therapies, or if you'd like to receive more information about special offers, price lists etc, please contact me at the following address.

I am offering a 10% discount to all Arkangel readers so contact me today and let Healing Touch touch your life! Please note that the aromatherapy and massage treatments are available for ladies only.

Zwirn's fur shop in central London has attracted a great deal of attention since it moved from its original site in Bond Street to its new location at 13a, Grafton Street, London W1 (0171 629 2747). Probably the West End's flagship fur shop, it has been under almost constant siege from animal liberationists. The shop has recently taken out an injunction against protesters and one person has already been imprisoned for refusing to abide by it.

Capitalism & Animals

On 18th June 1999, thousands of people descended on the City of London to protest against the Group of 7 (G7) leading capitalist states meeting in Koln and against the exploitation of people, animals and the environment. Whilst most of the estimated 6,000 people spent the day dancing in the street, sitting in the road or enjoying the sun, others were causing serious damage to various financial institutions around the Square Mile. The planet is being systematically destroyed by multinationals bent on (literally) making a killing at the expense of the poor, displaced and innocent.

The development and maintenance of capitalism as a system that exploits humans, is dependent upon the abuse of animals. Furthermore the movement that abolishes capitalism by changing the relations between humans also involves the fundamental transformation of the relations between humans and animals. All life on planet earth is becoming increasingly enmeshed in a global economy based on money, profit and exchange - capitalism. Virtually everything has a price on it - food, drink, the soil, homes, plants, animals, the labour of humans. Needs and desires count for nothing - those who cannot afford to pay the price have to do without even if the consequence is death.

For the majority of human beings the consequence is a life dominated by work, half-lived in schools, factories, offices and prisons. For many, this is compounded by the effects of poverty, war and various forms of oppression. But humans are not the only creatures caught up in this net. Animals of all kinds are subject to the industrial application of suffering and death in the wild, in factory farms and laboratories.

Capitalism tries to squeeze the last drop of life out of human beings, intensifying the work process to eliminate all non-productive movements. It seeks the 'eradication of any uncontrolled movement of the hand, any unproductive glance of the eyes, any unwanted wandering of the mind.' Similarly with animals, the aim is to eliminate everything that does not contribute to the final product, to turn them into machines for the conversion of feed into meat and other commodities.

With animals as with humans, the factory system aims to restrict the movement of the body to maximise profits. Factory farming was already established by Roman times. Plutarch writes that: "It is a common practice to stitch up the eyes of cranes and swans and shut them up in dark places to fatten." In 17c England, pigs, poultry and lambs were fattened by being confined indoors in darkness: "Geese were thought to put on weight if the webs of their feet were nailed to the floor," (Thomas). Then as now, the movement of animals was restricted because it burned up calories and therefore slowed down weight gain.

With animals things have gone a stage further with the modification of the physical bodies of animals to make them more productive. Described by John Zerzan: "The domesticating of animals... defies natural selection and re-establishes the controllable organic world at a debased, artificial level... Transmuted from a state of freedom to that of helpless parasites, these animals become completely dependent on man for survival. In domestic mammals as a rule, the size of the brain becomes relatively smaller as specimens are produced that devote more energy to growth and less to activity. Placid, infantilised, typified perhaps by the sheep, most domesticated of herd mammals; the remarkable intelligence of wild sheep is completely lost in their tamed counterparts. The social relationships among domestic animals are reduced to the crudest essentials. Non-reproductive parts of the life cycle are minimised, courtship is curtailed, and the animal's very capacity to recognise its own species is impaired."

The animal industry continues to dominate land use in many parts of the world. In Britain 80% of agricultural land is used directly or indirectly for meat and dairy production. In many parts of the Third World, food production is dominated by the growth of cereals to sell for animal feed in the west rather than to meet local needs. Animals in factory farms produce huge amounts of waste, with frequent incidents of pollution of water and land.

Selective breeding of animals is now being refined through the development of a range of genetic/biotechnological methods. Animal species are being genetically manipulated to develop xenotransplantation (cross-species organ transplants) and pharming (the production of drugs and other products from genetically mutated animals). The twentieth century has seen a number of attempts to apply animal breeding techniques to humans, as promoted by the eugenics movement. Forced sterilisation and other efforts have been applied to stop the 'unfit' from breeding. While this was applied ruthlessly determination, eugenics programmes have also implemented in social democratic Sweden and elsewhere.

It would be a mistake to think that the exploitation of animals is now only of marginal concern to capital. The companies involved in funding animal experiments are some of the world's largest multinationals. Agribusiness is becoming increasingly capitalised. In the past capital was largely invested in the manufacture and retail of products made from animals reared by relatively independent farmers. Today, farmers are going out of business as larger companies take over every stage of the animal industry. For instance, one company, the Grampian Country Food Group, supplies one third of UK chickens to eat (200 million a year). Direct corporate involvement in farming will be accelerated as capital expands its new biotechnological frontier.

The dynamic of capitalism is towards more control over all life, human or animal. If things move in the opposite direction it will only be because capital has been forced to take a different turn or abolished altogether.

The Vegan Society

The Vegan Society was formed in 1944 by a group of vegetarians who had recognised the ethical compromises implicit in lacto (ie dairy dependent) vegetarianism.

Abhorrence of the cruel practices inherent in dairy, livestock and poultry farming is probably the single most common reason for the adoption of veganism. The Vegan Society has seen many changes over the past 50 years, with veganism now finding a place in most people's vocabulary. The Vegan Society has played a part in the vegan movement in general, providing information leaflets, books and the Vegan magazine. The magazine provides information on all aspects of veganism, whether it be environmental, health, raw food, animal liberation or all of these issues. It also keeps people up to date with the latest vegan products and offers help to those who feel isolated, showing them that they are part of an ever-growing movement.

The Vegan Society could be at the forefront of the movement that is now spreading far and wide. With greater support, animal liberationists could help the Society grow and break down the boundaries that are currently holding the vegan movement back.

We encourage as many people as possible to join the Vegan Society, so that they may help to move the Society forward. Membership details are below:

VEGAN STRAIGHT EDGE

Straight Edge refers to a philosophy whose most basic tenets promote a drug-free lifestyle. It developed as an off-shoot of the punk rock/hardcore scenes of the early 1980s when the term itself is believed to have been coined by Ian Mackaye, in the self-titled song, while he was the singer of the seminal hardcore band, Minor Threat.

The philosophy of Straight Edge is very simple. One must not drink alcohol, smoke, take drugs, or have promiscuous sex.

In the 12 years since the demise of Minor Threat, these simple beliefs have transformed the minds of many people. While the original definition of Straight Edge only included the rejection of mind altering substances and promiscuous sex, modern interpretations include a vegan diet and an increasing involvement and awareness of environmental and political issues.

Veganism became associated with the Straight Edge movement because it allows the individual to eliminate certain poisons from the body whilst not eating meat and dairy products. The shift towards veganism occurred during the early mid-90s and is seen as a logical step to increased purification. It is well documented that cigarettes, alcohol and drugs, have been and continue to be tested on animals. Using any of these poisons equates to support for vivisection, multinationals, possible addiction and degenerative diseases.

For a very interesting and in-depth look into healthy living/eating, read "Living Foods for Optimum Health" by Brian Clement & Theresa Foy DiGeronimo. This book is filled with information on nutrition, vegan raw food recipes and information on health and well being.

ANIMALS IN GREECE...

... and what the Holiday Brochures don't tell you!

Lazy fat mongrels sleeping in the shade or paddling along the warm beaches in the evening. Kittens meowing from the balconies of whitewashed houses. These are the many images that tourists have of animals in Greece - the sort of images seen in the holiday brochures and on postcards. The truth is, many of the stray dogs and cats are poisoned at the end of the holiday season or they may even die from starvation or disease. The average life-span of a stray dog or cat in Greece is less than two years. Last year I worked for six months at an animal sanctuary near Athens, run by the Greek Animal Rescue, a UK based charity (Reg. Charity No: 802243). It was a harrowing, unforgettable but ultimately a very positive experience.

THIS IS AN ATTEMPT TO CONVEY THE REALITY OF LIFE FOR ANIMALS IN GREECE, AND TO SHOW WHAT CAN BE DONE TO HELP.

DOGS - Spaying & neutering
... a positive way forward

People in Greece rarely neuter their dogs. They see this as unnatural and routinely let them have puppies. Normally they will keep the puppies for 2-3 months and then they take them somewhere and "let them go" - i.e., dump them. This is seen as "giving them a chance", the natural way of the world. Within days most of the puppies will have died from dehydration in the scorching sun. The rest are highly likely to die from parvo or distemper as soon as they come into contact with other stray dogs. The survivors add to the tens of thousands of stray dogs found everywhere in Greece.

WHAT HAPPENS TO ALL THE STRAYS?

Aside from parvo and distemper, stray dogs in Greece face other life-threatening diseases. Many are found to be

- infested with ticks, sometimes with literally thousands of them. These blood-sucking life destroying parasites are also
- carriers of many diseases, though if treated in time they can be cured. Then there is Kala-azar (Leishmaniasis), a
- tropical disease transmitted by a sandfly, which is incurable.
- It is a slow, wasting disease which attacks the immune system and causes most of the internal organs to fail over a - period of months. The skin becomes dry and scabby and
- when it flakes off, it leaves the dog covered in open sores which fail to heal.

- Poisoning of dogs is a widespread practice throughout Greece, usually carried out at the end of the tourist season (or at any time the strays are deemed to be a nuisance).
- They die a slow and agonising death after eating pieces of meat or bread laced with rat poison, farm pesticides, or crushed glass, scattered around indiscriminately. This is illegal, but it is a law that is not enforced. We have also - found many examples of dogs that have been subjected to even more barbaric practices, such as being tied to a railway
- line; dragged behind cars by the front legs tied with a rope; tortured with barbed wire, hanged from trees; thrown in lime, shot by hunters... the list goes on.

- Every year, thousands of dogs are run down by cars; Greek
- drivers rarely slow down or make an effort to avoid the dogs which are generally regarded as vermin. Dead dogs of all
- descriptions litter the Greek highways. They will be removed from the public squares, but on the sides of the
- faster roads they rot quickly in the sun. Every time I drove to the vets, I would stop by the latest casualties to check
- they were dead. Many of the dogs at the sanctuary are road traffic casualties and still limping, though their injuries by
- now healed.

- Cold and starvation also claim many lives. There are many
- kind Greeks who feed stray dogs and cats, but they rarely have the resources or the inclination to neuter the animals.
- Feeding them becomes a never-ending task where the - population races ahead of the available food supply. As a result, we are constantly finding seriously underweight dogs which we take to the shelter to restore back to health.

CATS

Although slightly better able to look after themselves, cats do suffer many of the same problems as dogs. They are bred out of control, and left to fend for themselves as kittens. Vast number succumb to cat'flu and other feline diseases, or they are run over by cars, poisoned...

GREEK ANIMAL RESCUE

Greek Animal Rescue (GAR) is a small UK based charity, founded in 1989 by Vesna Jones (after returning from a holiday in Greece), in order to alleviate the plight of animals in Greece. GAR's priority has always been and remains the rescue of injured and abandoned stray dogs and cats. GAR also promotes and undertakes neutering and is solely responsible for funding and running of the animal sanctuary in Markopoulo. The shelter was founded by Niko Leventakis, a local Greek man who has dedicated his life to helping the neglected and abused animals in Greece. He and his wife Linda manage the day-to-day running of the shelter, with the help of volunteer workers (mostly from the UK). Niko also deals with many emergency calls, picking up injured or diseased dogs at all times of the night and day. The shelter liaises with local vets, to spay and neuter as many strays as possible. It costs just £20 to spay a bitch, but the numbers that can be done are severely limited by lack of funds and volunteers to provide the post-operative care.

There are currently around 180 dogs and 60 cats at the shelter, but finding good homes for them is easier said than done. Some of them are homed with families in Greece and a few go to Germany, Holland and Switzerland - even the UK, despite the quarantine laws.

WHAT WE NEED

Basically we need two things: volunteers and money. Being a small charity and putting animals first, we are always struggling to keep our heads above water, but even so, a steady progress has been made over the years. We have many more hopes and dreams, but to realise them, we need more volunteers and yes, more money too.

If you would like to support our work, please make your cheques / POs payable to GAR and send to:

69 Great North Way, Hendon, London NW4 1PT

In return, you will receive a copy of GAR Newsletter [3 per year], which includes many rescue stories and other interesting articles.

We also "collect" unwanted or broken gold and silver jewellery, which is sold through a GAR supporter's jewellery shop in Dolgellau, where it fetches the best possible price. All profit from the sale of jewellery is given to GAR. The sale of donated jewellery raised over £6,000 in the past four years or so, but in order to keep this excellent "fund-raiser" going, we urgently need to restock. Current GAR supporters have already given what they had ... do YOU have an item of jewellery which you no longer want or is broken and are not likely to mend? If so, please send it to us.

You can contact GAR by phone:

or email at: gar-uk@dial.pipex.com.

You can also find out more about GAR from our website:

VOLUNTEER WORKERS

A rota of volunteer workers, mostly from the UK, have over the past few years taken turns in working at the shelter, for between two and six months at a time. Ideally there should always be at least three or four carers at the shelter, though when necessary, two people can cope adequately with the work. Because it takes at least one month for the newcomers to really get to know all the animals, the daily routine of cleaning, feeding etc, short-term workers are not really suitable, but not necessarily turned down, especially if there are at least two experienced workers already at the shelter.

Organising a regular supply of workers for the shelter has not been easy, but of those who have worked there, most have returned at least once (because they missed the animals so much!), for another stint of 2 or 3 months. However, we really need to find more permanent staff - ideally at least one person who would commit themselves to working at the shelter for a year or two and 2-3 other people for a few months at a time. That way a routine can be maintained, without any undue changes and stress to the animals.

Because the shelter is fairly isolated (a farm on the hill, in the middle of vineyards and pistachio groves, though the nearest village is as just a short bike ride away), we feel more at ease if there is at least one male worker at the shelter at all times; definitely nobody under 21 years old and everybody is expected to take responsibility for themselves. For anybody who may consider working at the shelter for six months or more, a trial period of 2-4 weeks is usually the best way of finding out if the work would suit them and enough time for us to assess if they are what we are looking for. Definitely no "adventure seekers"!

Whilst modest accommodation at the shelter and some food is provided for those working there, we are not in a position to pay any real wages and everybody is expected to cover their airfare. We try to help out the long-term workers with their living expenses when needed, but unfortunately our resources are very limited.

Working at our shelter is best suited to someone who:

- loves animals (of course!) and genuinely wants to help them.
- preferably has at least some experience of working with animals/ handling dogs & cats.
- is down to earth; i.e., sensible and able to make own decisions when needed.
- is an early riser and not afraid of hard work
- is able to deal with injured and sick animals and yes, death also
- doesn't mind living with few home comforts and lack of social life

... in short, somebody with two right hands, a big heart and simple needs ... if that describes you, we would love to hear from you.

ANIMALS IN GREECE HAVE VERY FEW FRIENDS...

PLEASE HELP US TO HELP THEM - PLEASE BE THEIR FRIEND TOO

DAMIEN HIRST

Damien Hirst, con 'artist' and pickler of animals, recently exhibited his work in a Brooklyn Museum art exhibition in New York. Hirst uses the bodies of animals suspended in formaldehyde within glass cases. One of the most piteous exhibits is of a lamb entitled: "Away from the Flock." Another, entitled: "Some Comfort Gained From The Acceptance of the Inherent Lies in Everything" depicts a cow sectioned in 12 separate cases (beginning and ending with a head) in what can only be described as the outpourings of a deranged mind. The bisected pigs, the case containing a fake cow's head covered with real flies and maggots, and the pretentious titles just go to show what Damien Hirst really is - a butcherer of animals and a part of the establishment that treats animals as objects of derision and abuse.

In April 1999, the Western Daily Press reported that Damien Hirst had taken possession of an art studio in Chalford, near Stroud. He secured a large warehouse style building on the edge of an industrial estate in the village. Hirst had been interested in setting up a studio for some time and this one lies between his home in Devon and his studio in London.

Over the years, Hirst has attracted several protests by animal liberationists appalled by his exploitation of animals. His exhibitions have been picketed and activists attacked a restaurant in London after Hirst displayed 'flayed bulls' heads in the bar.

Stop Quintiles' Animal Tests - campaigning against animal experiments at Quintiles' laboratories in Ledbury (Herefords) and Riccarton (Edinburgh)

Quintiles Locations

Other premises in Britain belonging to Quintiles are situated in Marlow, Egham, London, Staines, Battle, Esher, Bracknell, Bathgate, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leamington, Kingston upon Thames and Knutsford. We don't believe vivisection takes place at any of these, but demos outside by local AR groups would educate the staff that their employers are involved in animal torture elsewhere (many don't know) and put pressure on the company to pull out of animal experimentation. They are very concerned about their public image and don't like people to know they're involved in vivisection. Contact SQAT if you'd like more details.

Injunctions Make It Worse for Everett

On May 5th David J. Everett, head of toxicology at Quintiles lab, succeeded in obtaining injunctions at the High Court in London against two protesters, following a visit to his home by anti-vivisection campaigners who wished to ask him when he and Quintiles were going to stop torturing animals. Everett, who wasn't home at the time, told several lies about the protesters in his application for the injunction. Hardly surprising behaviour for a vivisector.

Just over two weeks later, at 4:30 in the afternoon, fifteen other campaigners, complete with anti-vivisection banners and placards, responded by holding a noisy demo outside Everett's house. There was much sympathy from passers-by and a lad who lives two doors down from Everett even joined the demonstration. Everett's wife called police, but there were no arrests and the demo was allowed to continue for two hours. Everett himself didn't turn up, as he had been advised to stay at Quintiles until the demo was over.

Then, on Friday, June 25th, a dozen activists staged another noisy two-hour demo outside Everett's home. Police and security guards were there to protect him when he returned home from work and two protesters were arrested and charged with Public Order Act offences. They were released on bail with a condition not to go within 5 miles of Ledbury. Everett (who has now installed CCTV outside his home) is one of those split-minded vivisectors who has "pets" (two bearded collie dogs) at home, but sees nothing wrong in going off to torture beagles and other animals at the laboratory.

For anyone else who wishes to politely question him about his activities, his address is 28-31 Lower Rd, Ledbury.

Demos in the USA

Activists surrounded the Quintiles office in Salt Lake City on Thursday, June 24th and, on Saturday 26th, ten protesters held a demo outside a Quintiles premises in San Francisco and distributed leaflets inside and outside the building.

Home Office Demo/Quintiles Occupation

On Thursday, July 15th about 40 people holding banners and placards held an anti-vivisection protest outside the Home Office in Queen Anne's Gate, London. One of the purposes of the demo was to demand that the Home Office revoke the licence granted to Quintiles to carry out animal experiments, and a 35,000 signature petition calling for the licence to be revoked was handed in.

About 30 of the protesters then staged a 40-minute occupation at the offices of Quintiles Holdings Ltd at 40-41 Pall Mall. Quintiles Holdings is one of 17 premises in the UK owned by the Quintiles Transnational Corporation.

Really Getting to Them

Activity against Quintiles' Ledbury laboratory has increased in recent weeks with morning pickets (to "welcome" the staff to work) as well as the usual afternoon ones (to "greet" them on their way home) and "home visits" to the houses of two Quintiles employees involved in animal experiments. All this is obviously upsetting Quintiles and their workers more than usual as, following one particularly boisterous picket, the company's solicitors threatened several demonstrators with injunctions to try to prevent them trespassing on Quintiles' property and blockading vehicles going in and out of the lab. Also, on several occasions, drivers of vehicles leaving the lab have attempted to knock down protesters standing at the roadside. The threat of injunctions is being ignored and SQAT is in the process of obtaining names and addresses of the offending drivers, so that action can be taken against them.

For anyone that might be interested, Quintiles' solicitors are:

Howard Kennedy, 19 Cavendish Square, London W1A 2AW, tel: 0207 636 1616 fax: 0207 664 4587 and the particular solicitor acting for Quintiles is: Nicholas Treppass, tel: 0207 546 8987 e-mail: N.Treppass@hk.law.co.uk.

Perhaps someone should politely inform these characters of the immorality of acting for a firm that tortures animals to death.

News from Scotland

On September 14th, about 20 protesters staged a picket outside Quintiles' vivisection lab at Heriot-Watt University Research Park, Riccarton, Edinburgh. Local animal rights campaigners took part in the protest organised by the BUAV. The laboratory bought 50 beagle pups from Leicestershire breeding farm, Harlan UK, in March, for the purposes of experimentation. Harlan was later the subject of a shocking report by the BUAV, following an undercover investigation, which found evidence of appalling neglect and the slaughter of healthy dogs that were surplus to requirements. The secretly filmed evidence is now the subject of a Home Office inquiry whose results are expected soon. The BUAV also held a public meeting - and although their interest in campaigning against Quintiles is likely to be short-lived, it did enable Edinburgh Animal Rights to get lots of new people interested in their ongoing campaign against the laboratory. Meanwhile, Glasgow animal rights activists have been busy sending info about Quintiles' animal experiments and the Harlan connection to Scottish politicians and the media to counteract the favourable publicity Quintiles recently received following their creation of 1500 new jobs in the Edinburgh area.

Finally, we have learned that Australian pharmaceutical company Metabolic has appointed Quintiles' Edinburgh lab to carry out animal experiments on AOD9604, a new anti-obesity drug it is developing. So once again innocent animals have to suffer just because people don't have the willpower to consume less calories and take more exercise.

David Hall and Partners breed albino guinea pigs for vivisection. They are based at 2 sites at Darley Oaks Farm, Newchurch, Nr. Burton-on-Trent, Staffs. (Tel: 01283 575321). Hidden away in sheds at the back of these sites there are over 10,000 guinea pigs that are bred for use in horrific, useless experiments in vivisection laboratories.

After a raid on the farm by concerned campaigners, video coverage taken in the sheds shows a high mortality rate amongst the guinea piglets, with evidence of distressed mothers killing and eating their young. The pens were filthy and full of excrement - the paperwork taken from the farm explains that the pens, containing 9 females to 1 male, are only cleaned once a week. These 'stock' pens, where the guinea pigs are bred from for 20-22 months unless 'mothering quality or litter sizes determine that they should be culled', and where many of the guinea pigs spend their entire lives, are just 5ft by 2ft. That is the amount of space they think is suitable for 10 adults and as many as 24 young at any one time. Within these prisons there is nowhere for the guinea pigs to pursue their natural behaviour of hiding, foraging and burrowing. There are so many guinea pigs dying in this hellhole that the bodies have to be removed on a daily basis!

What you can do:

- Turn up to the daily demos, regional weekend demos, Saturday all night vigils, and national demos.
- Spread the word about this disgusting 'business' and our campaign to end it. Leaflets and factsheets are available (all free - donations appreciated).
- Write & phone Hall, his suppliers, and his customers to tell them what you think. Info is available in the factsheets and the newsletters.
- Help by fundraising, writing letters, and spreading the word around the country about the use of guinea pigs and all animals in cruel and scientifically invalid experiments.

Some Hunting News

The foxhunting season started on 1st November, so if you would like to go sabbing, contact your local sab group. Details below.

Terrierman Convicted

Jim Goodyer, terrierman for the Woodland Pytchey Fox-hounds in Northants, was convicted and fined for common assault on 23rd September. The incident occurred at a meet on 27th March when sabs were attacked by hunt thugs armed with pickaxe handles.

Hunt Saboteur Targeted

A well-known hunt sab from Dorchester opened his front door on the night of Friday 1st October to find a parcel containing a mutilated rabbit. A noose was placed around its neck, and a note reading: "You should have seen it scream, ha ha ha," stuffed in its ripped open stomach. The parcel was immediately passed to local police.

How You Can Help End Bloodsports

Organisations such as the Countryside Alliance are backed by some of the richest people in Britain, and can spend millions on advertising and paid campaigners. Their wealth and power gives them a stranglehold over most of the media and some of the most influential people in government.

The Hunt Saboteurs Association, in comparison, runs solely on funds from you, the public, who keep the organisation afloat with donations and membership. It depends on the small band of volunteers who give over their spare time to keep the HSA running smoothly; who produce leaflets and adverts and sales goods; who staff stalls; who give advice to other sabs and deal with the press. And most importantly, it depends on the dedication of the men and women who, week in, week out, defy the hunts on their own turf and in the face of increasing violence and police powers, still manage to save the lives of thousands of hunted animals every year.

There are several ways you can help the HSA:

■ Get in touch with your local sab group (details from the office on 01273 622827) and either go sabbing yourself or help in other ways such as fundraising or mechanics.

■ If you are not already a member of the HSA, please join now.

■ Ask the office for back copies of HAS's magazine 'Howl' to leave in places where they can be read by members of the public (ie doctors' waiting rooms or library reference section).

■ Support us by buying HSA T-shirts and other merchandise. Phone the office if you don't already have a sales goods order form.

■ Let the hunters know what you think! Write to your local newspaper's letters page and write to your MP to let them know your views on government plans either regarding hunting or hunt saboteurs.

HSA membership costs £10 (waged) or £7.50 (unwaged). The HSA's magazine 'Howl' is produced 4 times a year. Donations are welcome.

Cheques/PO's should be made payable to 'HSA'.

Alternatives to Animal Use in Eastern Europe

The work of Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine to eliminate animal use in medical schools in Eastern Europe culminated this year in an international conference in Poznan, Poland, attended by physicians from the US, Poland, Russia, and the Ukraine. Professors Andrzej Trzebski and Kazimierz Ziemnicki of the Medical Academy of Warsaw and the University of Poznan, respectively, had eliminated animal use at their schools, with help and encouragement from PCRM and Fundacja Animals. Realising enormous educational and financial benefits, they aim to see their new non-animal teaching methods to become routine elsewhere.

Doctors Jerry Vlasak and Rich McLellan, PCRM physician member, met with officials of medical institutes in the Ukraine, all of whom were initially sceptical about the feasibility of non-animal methods. By the end of the conference, however, they were so interested in eliminating animal use at their institute that they invited Dr. Vlasak to the Ukraine to aid the process. One obstacle faced by the Ukrainian educators is the lack of computer hardware to run the physiology and pharmacology computer programs now used in Poland. PCRM is working to help provide the needed resources, and will build upon this progress in Eastern European medical education to encourage further elimination of animal use.

Animal rights demo punch-up

Sunday Independent

AN animal rights demonstration erupted into violence when opponents were confronted by furious farmers outside a burger bar.

A dozen protesters were handing out shock-tactic leaflets outside the Wimpy's Restaurant in High Street, Dorchester. They were campaigning against the 'slaughter of pregnant cows for hamburger meat.'

On-looker Idris Martin said he believed that the farmers were eating at a table when a protester slapped a leaflet in front of them. 'One man got very upset,' he said. 'He tore the banners and started on the leaflets. Punches were exchanged.'

'This farmer kept saying: "You're stealing my livelihood".'

One animal rights campaigner, who would give his name only as Neil, said: 'A couple of farmers came in and started ripping up leaflets and hitting people.'

'We had a bit of a bundle, although I wouldn't say we fought back. We are a pacifist group.'

By the time the police arrived, the fighting had stopped. Paul Simpson, chairman of Dorset branch of the NFU, said leaflets were 'disgusting and full of lies.' He said: 'They say old cows are slaughtered for burgers - but no cows older than 30 months are allowed into the food chain.'

Scots to lead field in banning fox hunting

By JASON ALLARDYCE, SCOTTISH POLITICAL REPORTER

FOX hunting will be outlawed in Scotland by next summer - up to two years ahead of England, it emerged yesterday.

Labour ignited the wrath of countryside campaigners by confirming that a backbencher in the Scottish Parliament will table a Private Member's Bill to prohibit hunting with packs of hounds.

Because the Edinburgh Parliament has no second chamber and a ban commands support among a majority of MSPs, the Bill is likely to become law by next summer.

Mike Watson, the Labour MSP for Glasgow Cathcart who will pilot the Bill, is preparing to make a statement later this week.

He is known to have liaised closely with the pressure group Advocates for Animals on a draft Bill similar to that of Mike Foster, the Labour MP, which was blocked by Tories in the Commons last year.

The Bill, being co-sponsored by the Scottish National Party MSP Tricia Marwick, is expected to outlaw hunting and killing with hounds for foxes, as well as hare-coursing.

To minimise the impact on farming communities, it will continue to be legal, however, for farmers to shoot foxes on their land to protect livestock.

Fox destruction clubs, which use hounds to flush out foxes to be shot by marksmen, often to protect farm animals at lambing time, are also expected to be allowed to continue.

Les Ward, director of Advocates for Animals, was confident that the Scottish Bill, which will affect ten mounted hunts mainly in the Scottish Borders, will go before Holyrood before the year's end.

He added: "Our nation has been tarnished by the barbarism of blood sports for too long. We have got rid of badger baiting, cock fighting and putting children up chimneys. It is time to get rid of the inde-

Butcher's van destroyed in arson attack

YOUNG arsonists are believed to have struck at a family butchers in Stowmarket - causing thousands of pounds-worth of damage in a late night attack.

Police are hunting the youths responsible as the owners count the costs of the incident.

R C Hubbard butchers in the heart of Combs Ford, Stowmarket, had its delivery van and garage destroyed on Sunday night at 10.20pm.

The van, owned by Ronald Hubbard, was left a charred wreck, its seats melted, the chassis blackened. His garage was also severely damaged. The garage, one of a row of four, is close to the business in Poplar Hill.

A POULTRY factory employing more than 200 workers has closed its doors for the last time.

Grampian Country Foods revealed its plans to shut its chicken processing factory in Bury St Edmunds three months ago. The move came only two years after the company bought the Cotton Lane site and left 255 workers facing relocation or redundancy.

Alasdair Cox, spokesman for the Aberdeen-based company, said: "Following the consultation period with the employees a significant number of the workforce have taken positions at other Grampian locations at Witham, Eye, Haverhill and Attleborough (Norfolk). "Some staff have opted for the redundancy package and the remainder have gained jobs at other local Bury businesses."

Souvenir trade 'puts rare animals at risk'

TOURISTS are putting endangered species at risk by bringing home increasing numbers of illegal wildlife souvenirs, the World Wide Fund for Nature has warned. It says more than 50,000 traditional Chinese medicine products were seized in the UK last year and the number of animal souvenirs seized was up by 14 per cent.

Among items uncovered by customs officers were a peregrine falcon, listed as a parrot on official papers, and a 6ft stuffed Nile crocodile. WWF-UK's Stuart Chapman said: 'By buying these souvenirs, you could be putting some of our most beautiful wildlife at risk.'

Elephant who could not forget dies of broken heart

Sutapa Mukerjee
in Lucknow

For 24 days Damini refused to move, eat or drink. Despite the attention of a series of experts, the 72-year-old seemed determined to die, her heart apparently broken by the death of a close companion.

Finally, on Wednesday, Damini the elephant died in her enclosure at the Prince of Wales zoo in Lucknow, northern India, her loose skin hanging over protruding bones, bed sores covering her body.

Damini had arrived at the zoo last year after being confiscated from owners who were illegally transporting her. She was alone in her new home for five months until September, when a pregnant younger elephant named Champakali arrived on a kind of maternity leave.

Although zoo officials were worried about caring for Champakali, "Damini took up the job instantaneously", Utkarsh Shukla, a vet at the zoo, said.

The two elephants became inseparable. According to experts such attachments are common, with the older elephant caring for the younger, especially in pregnancy.

When Champakali died on April 11 giving birth to a still-born calf, Damini seemed to shed tears, according to zoo officials. For days she stood still in her enclosure, barely nibbling at the 2 tonnes of sugarcane, bananas and grass heaped in front of her.

Her legs swelled and eventually gave way, leaving Damini lying on her side, head and ears drooping, trunk curled. Tears rolled down her face and the four-tonne elephant rapidly lost weight.

She lay "staring at the staff with her sad eyes, moist with tears", according to Kamaal, a zookeeper.

A week ago she completely stopped eating and on Wednesday she died. "In the face of Damini's intense grief, all our treatment failed," said Dr Shukla.

"It will take me some time to get over the death of my two loved ones," said Kamaal. AP

Hirst exhibition 'sick stuff' says Mayor Giuliani

THE UNITED STATES opening of the controversial "Sensation" exhibition - showcase for Damien Hirst, Chris Ofili and other provocative Young British Artists - was in jeopardy yesterday after the Mayor of New York denounced their work as "sick stuff" and threatened to withdraw all city funding from the museum hosting the show.

"Sensation", the Charles Saatchi-owned collection that took the Royal Academy by storm in 1997, was due to open at the Brooklyn Museum of Art on October 2 for a three-month run. But Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said the city would withhold its annual $7m (£4.3m) subsidy, almost a third of the museum's budget, unless the exhibition was cancelled.

Organising the City anarchists

ANARCHY is highly organised these days (Tim Reid wries). The bloody riots that erupted in the City of London on Friday had been planned in detail on the Internet for months.

What has emerged since Friday's Carnival Against Capitalism, which resulted in damage estimated at £2 million, is how the Internet has become a powerful tool for Britain's anarchist groups.

A battle plan timetabling Friday's events was drawn up at the end of last year by a previously unknown group called J18. Its website included a map of Central London showing the protest targets, including "merchant banks", "exchanges", "institutional investors" and "law firms". It gave numbers for telephone lines telling people to gather at Liverpool Street station, offering help with accommodation, and giving the numbers of civil rights solicitors.

One City of London police officer said: "There is a hard core of violent and dangerous protesters who are now able to use the Internet and mobile phones to great effect... they can use the modern technology to recruit new members much more easily."

J18, named after Friday's date - June 18 - planned a worldwide protest against Third World debt to coincide with the start of the G8 summit in Cologne. It claims no leaders, but its senior figures are members of Reclaim the Streets, the anti-car movement that has disrupted London on previous occasions.

■ Police are investigating an arson attack on a family firm's meat lorries and believe that animal liberation activists may be behind it

by Helen Parrott

News Reporter

ANIMAL RIGHTS EXTREMISTS are being blamed for a blaze at a family-run meat processing business which has caused damage estimated at £500,000.

The arsonists targeted seven meat-laden lorries parked in the yard of Cherryfield (Croydon) Ltd, in Whistlers Meat Market, Cherry Orchard Road, which they set on fire late on Saturday.

Petrol-soaked clothing was put under the wheel arches of each lorry and an incendiary device used to start the blaze. Plastic bottles of flammable liquid were also found nearby.

Police believe the arson attack was the work of the Animal Liberation Front or a similar hard-line animal rights organisation.

DC Matt Robins, at South Norwood CID, said: "There is no doubt that this fire was started deliberately. It was a professional job."

"There were seven fires under all seven lorries parked in the yard and each was started with petrol soaked devices. They are gutted."

Protesters wreck GM show crop

By David Brown
Agriculture Editor

PROTESTERS destroyed plots of genetically modified sugar beet at Britain's main arable crops show window in Hertfordshire yesterday.

Members of the action group Genetix Snowball evaded security staff at Cereals '99 and ripped up two demonstration plots of Monsanto's experimental "Roundup-Ready" sugar beet as a crowd of farmers looked on at Vine Farm, Wendy, near Royston.

The event is the main national show where farmers can see the latest cereals, oil-seed rape and sugar beet varieties growing in demonstration plots.

Other demonstration plots, including non-GM varieties, were destroyed by activists on the site in May.

One of the protesters, who described himself as Alex Potts, a teacher from North Yorkshire, said: "GM crops are bad for the Third World and bad for the environment. We have only destroyed commercial promotional crops, not research plots and we are perfectly open about what we do."

Loggers plan giant GM trees

FORESTS OF giant genetically engineered trees are being planned in a development which ecologists fear will threaten entire ecosystems.

Pulp and paper companies have teamed up with the world's leading biotechnology firms to alter trees genetically to make them grow faster, pulp more easily and give them resistance to pests.

But the drive to create "designer trees" has caused alarm among environmentalists who fear that it could cause irreparable damage to the plants, insects and animals that rely on trees to survive.

They say that if logging companies create "custom-made" trees the world's forests could be disrupted, along with the complex ecosystems they sustain.

They also fear that new GM traits - such as herbicide resistance - will be spread to natural trees, creating hybrids. In a nightmarish vision of the future, they warn that trees engineered to grow faster could cross-breed with their ordinary relatives, creating enormous trees which block out the sun, suck up huge amounts of water and damage houses with their giant roots.

Several patents on genetically modifying the structure of trees have recently been filed and multi-million dollar joint ventures are already being forged between logging companies and agro-chemical firms.

Last month, Monsanto signed a $60m joint venture with International Paper, Westvaco Corporation and Fletcher Challenge Forests to genetically engineer faster-growing trees with improved fibre quality.

In Britain, the first test site of genetically engineered poplar trees has been planted near Bracknell, Berkshire, by biotechnology company Zeneca.

The EU-funded experiment is designed to create a species which can produce cleaner paper. All the GM trees are female so they cannot breed with neighbouring species.

But environmentalists fear that, because trees take up to 100 years to mature, it will be impossible to conduct proper tests to predict any effects on the environment.

The Forestry Commission, the Government's ruling body on UK woodland, has been experimenting with engineering the genes in Sitka spruce to make the pine resistant to pests and diseases. But the Commission has warned that GM organisms should not be used in forestry in the UK until they have been properly tested.

Shell threatening tropical dry forest

A GAS pipeline backed by Shell threatens to destroy the world's biggest remaining tract of tropical dry forest, the World Wide Fund for Nature (WWF) warned yesterday.

The Chiquitano forest in eastern Bolivia, home to many of the world's most vulnerable species, including the jaguar, the ocelot and the critically endangered hyacinth macaw, faces bisection by a 224-mile-long pipeline transferring natural gas from Rio San Miguel in Bolivia to Cuiaba in Brazil.

The development, backed by a consortium led by the US oil giant Enron and in which Shell is a 25 per cent partner, is "completely unacceptable," said Clive Wicks, head of international programmes for WWF-UK. "This area has been identified as one of the richest, rarest and most biologically outstanding examples of the Earth's diverse habitats and a priority region for conservation efforts," he said.

CIRCUS trainer Mary Chipperfield flew to Spain yesterday after she was fined £7,500 for cruelty to a baby chimp – and vowed to continue working with animals, despite a storm of protest.

Animal welfare activists and MPs demanded that Chipperfield and her husband Roger Cawley – fined £1,000 for cruelty to a sick elephant – should be banned from ever working with animals again.

There were rowdy scenes after the court hearing in Aldershot, Hampshire, when the couple were mobbed by more than 100 animal activists while they were escorted by police to a waiting van.

The 100-yard walk took 10 minutes, as the crowd screamed abuse and threw bananas and coins. At least 50 police officers held back the crowd.

Chipperfield, 61, pledged to defy campaigners and continue working with animals, despite the £7,500 fine imposed by the court for cruelty to the chimp Trudy.

The separate £1,000 fine imposed on her 64-year-old husband left them with a total bill of £20,740, including legal costs.

HEALTH AND VIVISECTION

- The Medical Deception -

It's claimed that testing on animals will 'screen out' chemicals which may be harmful to humans, and that research on animals will produce 'cures' for human diseases. But which animal is relevant to a human being? What might suit a dog may kill a cat, be harmless to a rabbit, but toxic to a rat. And the human being? Will he/she react like the dog, the cat, the rabbit or the rat?

'In the early days of safety evaluation, pharmacologists studied the safety of drugs at low doses on each other, gradually increasing the doses, and extending the number of persons involved. Later the wild rat became the experimental animal. This is how the drug safety testing industry began, without any consideration as to whether the rat was a scientifically appropriate surrogate species for man', (1) - and has never been validated as such!

Today, a wide variety of different animal species are used. But have they produced results that are relevant to humans?: 'Steroids are known to induce teratogenesis in rabbits by a mechanism irrelevant to humans. Two drugs declared safe for human use from experiments on animals were subsequently found -from human studies- to be so unsafe as to be lethal. A solvent to decaffeinate coffee was alleged to be tumorigenic, but extensive metabolism and pathology studies of the chemical in a variety of animal species indicated that rodents were uniquely susceptible, so the solvent was exonerated'. (2)

'Many women died from blood clotting after using the contraceptive pill, which had been shown to thin the blood in tests on dogs and rats'. (3) Another contraceptive that worked in rats had the opposite effect in humans!

(4) It is now used for breast cancer: the medical literature states, 'liver tumours develop in rats but not mice.' (5). So, will the patient react like the rat or the mouse? - Or neither?

'A fertility drug was tested in pregnant rabbits and rats. Rabbit foetuses developed normally, but rat foetuses showed retarded development'. (6) Is the patient like a rabbit or a rat?

'Valpoic acid showed monkeys, rabbits and rats contradicted human studies. Rat results were opposite to the mouse results; there were no side effects from high doses given to monkeys, yet humans showed side effects at low doses, and hamsters could tolerate doses 10 times higher than humans!' (7)

'Because of the difference in the genetic code and biological arrangements between one living being and another, the reactions to drugs and other stimuli between one species and another will also be different. This is not science, it is a lottery'. (8)

The most controversial drug is thalidomide. This drug was originally marketed in several countries under 51 different names, as a harmless sedative. Although numerous doctors had reported side effects in their patients, notably the nerve degeneration polyneuritis, (9) it was still prescribed to pregnant women. The biochemical division of Distillers (UK), which marketed the drug in Britain, was in imminent danger of being sold. They hoped that by buying the patent rights to Distavil and Distavit (thalidomide) they could avert this. A consultant from a Liverpool hospital quickly carried out trials and the drug was released in Britain. (10) It is true that thalidomide was not tested in pregnant animals prior to human use, but Barbara Davies, of the Research Defence Society (RDS) maintains, "It was not known that a drug could affect the foetus without affecting the mother." (11) This is not true. 'It was commonplace knowledge before the thalidomide tragedy'. (12)

After the birth of deformed babies, thalidomide was re-tested in pregnant animals world-wide, and according to Ms Davies, "It was found to have teratogenic effects in several laboratory animal species." (13)

In fact: 'amongst 10 strains of rats, 2 breeds of dogs, 3 strains of hamsters, 8 species of primates: cats, armadillos, swine, rabbits, guinea-pigs and ferrets, teratogenic effects were induced only occasionally', (14) but not in rats - the standard laboratory animal! So had these tests been carried out beforehand, the drug would still have been released. 'Scientists who testified at the thalidomide trial admitted, "there is no animal capable of predicting the effects in humans."' (15) 'It has been established that man is 60 times more sensitive to thalidomide than the mouse, 100 times more sensitive than the rat, 200 times more sensitive than the dog, and 700 times more sensitive than the hamster'. (16) Animal testing is so unreliable that doctors are warned: 'if the patient is pregnant do not use a drug unless it is imperative'. (17)

Despite the thalidomide tragedy, animal testing increased. The results speak for themselves as the number of deaths and injuries from drug side effects have soared! The RDS, and Seriously Ill for Medical Research (SIMR) maintain that adverse drug reactions (ADRs) are rare, just 0.01%! (18) And the infamous Colin Blakemore stated: "The occasional failure of animal testing to identify a dangerous drug," (19) ignoring published research showing that ADRs are now the 4th major cause of death after heart disease, cancer and strokes! (20) ADRs cost the NHS £2.18b annually, and prove how dangerously misleading animal studies are. It's hardly surprising that John D. Rockefeller, founder of the richest drugs industry in the world, only used homeopathic remedies himself!

The bulk of medical research is controlled by the pharmaceutical industry. 'The need to make money rather than cure disease drives and directs drug development'. (21) Most drugs are copies of, or similar to, existing drugs as companies compete for shares of this lucrative market. Drugs may alleviate, mask or suppress symptoms, but leave underlying causes untouched. Producing drugs under the pretext of looking for 'cures', that conveniently never materialise, ensures a constant demand for 'new' or 'improved' drugs. Sickness is crucial to the survival of drug companies. If drugs actually cured diseases the pharmaceutical industry would collapse. ADRs frequently cause other illnesses - requiring further research, and more drugs, and so this profitable merry-go-round continues.

Scientists maintain that animal research is vital to the study of human illnesses, because animals have the same organs as, and similar diseases to, ourselves. Animal organs are designed to work in conjunction with their nervous, cardiovascular, respiratory and blood pressure systems, which are different to ours; so are their hormones, enzymes and genes. Each species of animal also has an individual immune system that makes them susceptible to different micro-organisms, infections and diseases. 'There are 30,000 known human diseases, of which animals share just 1.16%'. (22)

It is scientifically impossible to study human disease in animals, so animals are often genetically engineered to try to 'humanise' them. A disease is then induced in the animal in attempts to mimic the human situation, then drugs are developed to treat the animal's artificially induced disease which bears little, if any, relevance to a human disease or a human being. This is called science! 'Breakthroughs' are frequently announced of 'promising' results in animals. This sends pharmaceutical share prices soaring. Following yet another (cancer) 'breakthrough' researchers admitted, "curing cancer in animals is not the same as doing it in humans, most drugs that work in animals turn out to be duds in humans, the field is littered with magic bullets that failed." And Dr. Richard Klausner, head of the National Cancer Inst. USA admitted, "We have cured cancer in mice for decades but it simply didn't work in humans." (23)

Animal rights organisations are often accused of putting the lives of animals before those of humans. Granted a few such extremists exist, but it is compassion that unites the movement whose members oppose just as vigorously all human rights abuse. "Your child or this rat," is a common argument used by scientists to evoke public emotion and support. These are the same scientists who gave us thalidomide, junior aspirin, (and other drugs) that killed or injured thousands of children, toxic chemicals linked to cancer, BSE, and a polluted environment. It is not a question of children versus rats, but children versus big business! Note how childhood diseases, birth defects, cancers, allergies, etc. have become endemic since the increased use of animal tested products!

The conflicting results of animal experiments have delayed many important discoveries, yet vivisection industries insist that medical progress has depended upon animal research; medical history reveals otherwise. Lawrence K Altman MD, medical correspondent to the New York Times, after 30 years research published a book, 'Who Goes First', charting how successful discoveries depended upon scientists in the past who, realising the irrelevance of animal studies, used themselves or each other to test new treatments, most of which have been falsely attributed to animal experiments. The Times (London) correspondent, Dr. James LeFanu, in his book 'The Rise and Fall of Modern Medicine', also points out that many successes are: "biological mysteries that lie beyond the realms of rational explanation." (i.e. luck) adding, "many such discoveries were preceded by enormous failures with death rates that would have today's surgeons struck off by the General Medical Council." As the book 'Doctors Decisions' (Oxford University Press) explains: '...the patient becomes the subject of the experiment until satisfactory answers are achieved by trial and error', - so who are the real guinea pigs?

Dr. Phil Hammond in his book, 'Trust Me I'm a Doctor', shatters "the myth that genetic engineering will provide answers to everything". He is concerned that public expectation has been led to "soar above what the medical profession can deliver".

Genes are only one part in a complicated sequence of events that lead to a disease. Environmental factors and poor diet are important contributory factors. Xenotransplantation is another myth. Considering that an organ from another human is rejected, and is magnified between people of a different race, size and weight, how is it expected an organ designed for another species can adapt to the different biochemical environment of a human being? The risk of viruses crossing the species barrier is another danger, but glossed over as the bio-tech companies speculate only on how many billions of pounds they hope to make from this bizarre practise. Even if there were enough human organs to meet the demand, the NHS could not afford the costs.

As the evidence against vivisection is indisputable, why is it allowed to continue? MONEY! Huge industries have evolved around animal research on which businesses and careers depend. Drugs and chemicals are major contributors to the economy; the revenue they bring in is too big, so governments will not move against these big earners. When John Gummer was Agriculture Minister he was overheard discussing organophosphates and admitted, "I daren't ban the stuff otherwise we'd have the full weight of the chemical industry on our backs and the government can't afford that." (24)

The use of animals can produce results that vary from one species to another, even between different strains of the same species, so that anything can be proved safe or unsafe, depending upon which animals are used, and the results required - allowing drugs and chemicals to be marketed that would not pass genuine tests of safety. In 1998, 'chemical companies joined together to use animals least sensitive to cancer, doses were kept low and exposure time shortened to make their chemicals appear less dangerous'. (25) Safety is assessed after trial and error upon the human population - the real guinea pigs, hence the huge number of ADRs and products withdrawn. Dan Fagin and Marianne Lavelle's book 'Toxic Deception' tells a chilling story of corporate manipulation of science (and the media), the falsifying of data and results. As George Bernard Shaw commented, "He who dares to vivisection will not hesitate to lie about it." Few scientists dare to expose the truth. Those that do are likely to have their funds withdrawn, career prospects ruined, or lose their jobs. Vivisection industries gain favour by sponsoring sport, the arts, and education. Scientists, hospitals, universities, medical journals, the media and governments also rely heavily upon their funding/revenue so they are all obliged to perpetuate the myth of animal experiments.

For commercial reasons, governments and the media allow vivisection industries to promote animal experiments. The anti-vivisection movement is denied the same opportunity, so consider the irrefutable facts: - Infectious diseases and childbirth were the most common causes of illness and death in past centuries due to poor sanitation and hygiene - not lack of drugs. When living conditions improved diseases dramatically declined and life expectancy soared - until the rise of the chemical/junk food industries, and as animal testing escalated, so did disease!

Despite the sophisticated medical technologies, 'miracle' drugs and 'breakthroughs' of this century, illnesses are increasing. Newer, deadlier, incurable diseases have emerged. Ill health is afflicting greater numbers of people. Cancer, once a medical rarity in children, is now a common childhood disease, and billions of animal experiments have not produced a single cure. We were designed, and have evolved, to live in harmony with Nature. The huge rise in sickness, extinction of many species, polluted air, food and water, is due to the increasing number of chemicals thrust upon us for commercial profit, marketed through the pseudo-scientific nonsense of animal experiments. Nature provided the best medicine in the world - free. Clean air, organic food and pure water. Unless these conditions are reinstated diseases will continue to dominate our lives:

There is one method of animal research that could benefit medical science: If scientists studied animals in their natural habitats, observed their interaction with Nature and their respect for the environment; their adherence to a proper diet, and if they become ill, their instinctive ability to fast or seek the appropriate herbs to heal themselves. Such studies could be of immense value to mankind. When this was put to a scientist during a debate, he retorted, "...ridiculous ... people aren't like animals"!! (26)

ANIMAL RIGHTS, HUMAN WRONGS

by DR VERNON COLEMAN

Reviewed by Katrina Fox, freelance journalist and animal rights activist

The thing about most books on animal rights is that they're great eye-openers for people who have no idea what really goes on inside our laboratories, abattoirs and so on, but for the long-term activist, it's often a case of preaching to the converted.

Vernon Coleman's new book, however, has it all - enough facts to shock the lay person or newcomer to the AR movement into action, and plenty of comment, advice and inspiration for the die-hard protester.

Originally intended as a critique of how the Labour Party failed to live up to its election promises regarding animals, the spirit of the book changed direction, and instead of being concerned with the past, Coleman was moved to focus on the future. Animal abuse is ingrained in our society because we have lost control, he argues. We are suffering from "21st Century Blues" - anger and frustration caused by politicians, lawyers and advertisers making us believe we're inadequate unless we have a certain product, or creating laws which mean that "however just your cause may be, you won't be able to win". The answer, according to Coleman has to be a political revolution.

It may sound idealistic, grand even, but you can't help but admire Coleman's passion. A rare breed of journalist, who will always let the truth get in the way of a good story, he admits to being fired from more than 40 newspapers and magazines for refusing to stay silent on issues such as vivisection, which he describes as "pseudo-scientific black magic". Coleman dares to speak the unspeakable and print the unprintable. Statements such as, "Adolf Hitler killed fewer people than the tobacco companies have killed" are peppered throughout his new book, and it's not hard to see why he's thrown so many hard-nosed Fleet Street editors into a blind panic over the years.

Part one of the book catalogues a variety of animal abuses and is useful if you need to brush up on your facts and figures. The reference to "one in six people in hospital are there because they have been made ill by their doctors" is a particularly good one to pull out of the hat when explaining the futility of animal experiments to test new drugs for humans to the ignorant friend or family member who believes they are necessary.

In part two there is an excellent guide to winning the moral and ethical arguments against vivisection. Newcomers to the AR scene should be able to combat any proposition put forward to support animal experiments. The legal versus moral debate on vivisection, for example, is answered by simple analogy: "In some conditions rape may be considered legally acceptable, but does that make it morally right? Parking a car in the wrong place is illegal, but does that make it immoral?"

The section on winning the medical and scientific arguments is a useful one to both newcomers and those who campaign against vivisection on ethical grounds who could benefit from detailed knowledge that counteracts scientific propaganda. And for anyone involved in AR campaigning who seeks a compromise on the issue of vivisection, Coleman warns, "To look for a compromise with vivisection would be like negotiating with gas chamber operatives during the Second World War in a search for a compromise over the holocaust."

Part three should be recommended reading for all students of politics, present and future, as it describes and analyses "how the Labour party turned trust into votes, won an election, tricked the electorate and betrayed those who voted for it". The government's failure to pass a bill outlawing hunting and its failure to set up a Royal Commission looking into animal experiments are discussed, as well as its lies over badger "culling".

In part four, Coleman's exposé of how the government and multinational corporations control the media sends shivers down the spine. But he offers action plans for AR activists: be prepared to shock, use new techniques to spread messages, manage the news, use stunts, and perhaps most soberingly - work together. "Pro-animal campaigners fight one another even more fiercely than they fight the animal abusers," he declares, citing the ALF's release of mink into the countryside earlier this year as an example, where certain animal welfare groups effectively supported the animal abusers by criticising the ALF's actions. He contrasts the in-fighting of activists with those involved in animal abuse where "there has been almost constant agreement and an enthusiasm about working together which should be envied by the pro-animal movement". His words may stick in the throats of many AR activists, but it's not just the establishment that Coleman is prepared to stand up to.

The title of the book is Animal Rights, Human Wrongs, and part five looks at a melee of topics affecting both humans and animals, including cancer, superbugs, contaminated water, microwaves, cloning and genetic engineering. George Orwell's predictions of what life would be like in 1984 were disturbingly accurate and it's scary to think that Coleman's vision of the 21st century could be just around the corner: "Tomorrow's children, the citizens of the genetically clean world, will know their place. They will line up neatly and on time to go to work. They will behave themselves. And they will treat the politicians, the policemen and the Gene Masters with respect."

But it's not all doom and gloom. Just as you start to feel depressed, angry, or indignant, Coleman wallops you with delightfully humorous statements, which are peppered throughout the book. On the subject of genetic engineering: "How many human genes do there need to be in a tomato before the tomato can complain to the European Court of Human Rights if you dare to threaten it with a knife?" he asks. On politics: "Even dead Harold Macmillan has more leadership qualities than the current pack of zombies between them." On the black market in organic produce that could be created if GM food is forced on us: "Men in sunglasses and expensive cars will stop at street corners, wind down a window and hand over a bag of potatoes in exchange for a bundle of cash." And finally, a comforting thought for the day: "Whether you spend your life cleaning out lavatories, giving blow jobs to weary businessmen or performing haemorrhoidectomies, you can start each new grey day comforted with the thought that you are surely unlikely to make such a cock-up of your job as Tony Blair is making of his."

At the end of the book, Coleman purports that the solution to all the ills of the world is the formation of a new political party - The People's Party, based on "honesty, respect and decency rather than commercial tendency". If we put our hearts into it, we can change the world, he proclaims, and while the cynics among us may need some convincing, we should take comfort in the fact that since the publication of this book, someone has taken up Coleman's challenge and the People's Party is now recruiting members.

Anti-Leather Protest

On Saturday 23rd October, the Campaign Against Leather & Fur held a protest against several shops in London's West End. The main focus of the protest was against the high street chain, GAP, who have recently been both promoting leather clothing on TV and selling it in their stores.

Despite the rain and a poor turnout, protesters made their way to the GAP store at 315, Oxford Street, London W1 and gave out several hundred anti-leather trade leaflets. The banner reading 'Leather - A Trade in Death' was held across the front of the store and one person using a megaphone reminded the general public that leather is the skin of murdered animals treated with chemicals. It was also pointed out that if people were not prepared to wear fur then neither should they be wearing leather.

An opportunity to promote the benefits of veganism was also seized upon and members of the public were asked to boycott GAP until the stores no longer sold animal skin. After a couple of hours, the protest moved down to South Molten Street where there was a brief demo outside 'The Leather Rat', a shop which sells nothing but animal skin. After a demo outside another branch of GAP, also in Oxford Street, protesters made their way to Browns, an exclusive clothes shop in South Molten Street, which according to the Independent, sold weasel-fur shoulder bags. The protesters entered the shop and questioned the manager about the sale of these and other fur items and (what appeared to be) pony-skin jackets. The manager insisted that the Independent "had got it wrong" and then called security to ask us to leave.

Due to the continuing heavy rain, it was decided to call it a day and as we approached the end of the road we happened upon yet another GAP store. One of the group decided to check it out only to be hauled out of the shop by a police officer (the first one of the day). He quickly informed us that if we continued to protest we would be arrested and would spend the entire weekend in a police cell. When we informed him of our right to protest he told us that we did have a right to protest - but not in South Molten Street!

CALF would like to thank those who came to draw attention to GAP dealing in animal skin, and especially to the two people and the dog who travelled all the way from Southend!

The Eden Fellowship

The Eden Fellowship is an association of vegan Bible-centred Christians. We find many references in the Bible which accord with our vegan outlook. Primarily we look to the original diet given by God as a blessing upon all His creation

"... Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed ... and every tree bearing fruit which yields seed, to you it shall be for meat ... and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth ... I have given every green herb for meat." (Genesis 1: 29-30)

The eating of flesh was given by God as a concession after the Flood and with it God gave a curse (Genesis 9: 3-6). Flesh, although allowed to be eaten, must not be consumed with its lifeblood. Consumption of blood and fats was and is considered an abomination before God Almighty (Leviticus 3:17). The question then arises: how does one eat flesh free of its blood and fats? Answer, impossible!!! Clearly then the Edenic diet carries the Almighty's blessing. Even scientists world-wide are eulogising over the positive benefits of fruit and vegetables as a preventative and curative of all manner of diseases. So God was right from the very beginning. What a loving Father!!!

Eden presented a perfect condition, but by our disobedience to God all was lost. The bridge building back to our relationship with God Almighty came about through the atoning redemptive sacrifice of Jesus, God's son. Through Jesus' faithfulness we all have a chance of sharing in the 'New Kingdom', Eden paradise restored.

Isaiah writes about this 'New Kingdom' to come and it is a vegan future for all!!! (Isaiah 11:1-9). There shall be no hurting or killing in the New Kingdom, even the animals will return to their vegan diet of former Eden times. Scattered throughout the Old Testament are references confirming what the New Kingdom to come will be like.

In the New Testament the writers draw a line at eating blood knowing that it is abominable before Almighty God. At the end of the Bible in the Book of Revelation (ch. 21:4) we have restated the earlier words of Isaiah. Truly, a vegan world awaits!!!

So what is this 'New Kingdom'? It is Eden restored. And it comes about after Jesus has returned to this Earth and rid this world of Satan and death, preparing the way for God Almighty to take charge of this new Earth. God himself will once again walk through the Earth just as he walked through the Garden of Eden (Revelations Ch. 21:3).

We at Eden Fellowship look forward to Jesus' return to conquer death and Satan once and for all, and return the Earth to its Edenic condition. We believe Jesus' return is imminent within a 40 year time span.

We are Unitarian Christians acknowledging Jesus' unique atoning and redemptive role in bringing humanity back to a rightful relationship with God Almighty, but we do not acknowledge Jesus as God Almighty. Jesus is the way to God Almighty, is in full agreement with God Almighty - but as God's son. We call ourselves Christians as we follow Jesus who has prepared the way to God Almighty Father.

We view everyday as a day to honour God Almighty and seek association with those like-minded to us at all times. We are sympathetic to sabbatharian worship and Sunday worship too. We view the body as a 'temple' of the Holy Spirit and in addition to a strict vegan outlook we refrain from unhealthy activities such as smoking, drinking, alcohol, tea and coffee; and illicit sexual practices.

We acknowledge God is love and want to spread God's love and neighbourly love to all - human and animal brethren alike. We are mindful to remember the words of Jesus, "Whatever you do to the least of my brethren, that you do unto me." Are not the animals also our brethren? Rendering service to humans and animals alike is God's love in action.

These are indeed exciting times as we seek to witness where Christians have been sadly very lacking i.e., promoting a truly Christian and truly vegan message. And what better time than the present where we find ourselves - in these endtimes. God is love.

The 2nd National Vegan Festival

On Sunday 15th August 1999, the 2nd National Vegan Festival took place in Central London. Following on from the previous year's highly successful event, this year's proved just as popular.

The Festival, organised by CALF, attracted in excess of 1,000 people from all over Europe as well as the USA. The diverse array of stalls, speakers, musicians, food and drink, and people, helped make the event unique. There was something for everyone.

Those with an interest in raw foods were able to sample fresh juices from two juice bars, listen to both Dr Douglas Graham and John Coleman speak about the raw food diet, or visit the Fresh Network table. Those interested in herbalism could listen to Afifah Hamilton, a qualified medical herbalist, speak about the fallacies of orthodox treatment or hear Doreen Corbin speak about Traditional Chinese Medicine and finding alternatives to animal substances.

For those who needed to get away from the crowds, they were able to attend the workshop 'Meditation on Innersound'. An important talk by Chris Sutoris, 'Veganism, the Environment and the impact of meat eating on the Third World' helped to remind us of the devastation that the meat industry is responsible for on the world in general. Dan Lyons of Uncaged spoke about xenotransplantation, Stokely Webster spoke of the dangers of Genetic Engineering and ALF Press Officer, Robin Webb, gave a rousing speech of how far the vegan/liberation movement has come and reminding us of how far we still have to go.

The caterers, Veggies, with their ever popular veggie burgers, snacks and cakes; Leaves of Life had a good range of sprouted grains, salad and kidney bean curry! and Jamie & Kasia had a tasty selection of macrobiotic snacks. The bar was run by the Pitfield Brewery and was selling organic juices, vegan wine and the very popular eco-warrior beer. The very young were given the chance to explore the beautiful surroundings of the room behind the stage, magically transformed by children's entertainer Nina Gebauer.

Stall holders on the day were:

Infiltration

- Lessons learned from Cointelpro

by Brian Click

Cointelpro is a covert American counter-intelligence program directed against the domestic population. This was made public when a 'citizen's committee to investigate the FBI' removed secret files from an FBI office in Media, in Pennsylvania, and released them to the press.

Infiltration

The most intense operations were directed against the Black Rights movement, particularly the Black Panther Party. However, many activists and groups who wanted to end US intervention abroad or institute racial, gender and class justice at home came under attack. Unions, minority rights and black nationalist groups, the SWP, the SDS, and a broad range of anti-war, anti-racist, student, GI veterans, feminist, lesbian, gay, environmental, Marxist and anarchist groups, as well as the network of food co-ops, health clinics, child care centres, schools, bookstores, newspapers, community centres, street theatres, rock groups and communes that formed the infrastructure of the counter culture.

Many files were destroyed or withheld during the subsequent "investigation". The agencies under investigation were allowed to edit the Senate Committee's reports before publication and the House Committee's report was suppressed altogether. William C Sullivan, who created the program and ran it throughout the sixties was killed in an uninvestigated 1977 "hunting accident" prior to testifying publicly.

Harassment and surveillance of such 'subversive' groups by state agencies had been known about before the revelations in the press, just as they are known to continue to this day - just go on any sizeable action and watch the number of police cameras present. However, the leak allowed much useful information to be made public about the extent of the secret state's methods, targets and impact.

Four main areas of operation were revealed:

1: Infiltration: Agents and informers did more discrediting and disrupting of groups than just spying on them; for example by smearing genuine activists as agents.

2: Psychological War From the Outside: Planting false stories in the media; printing bogus publications in the groups' names; forging correspondence; making anonymous phone calls; tampering with mail and telephone services; spreading misinformation about meetings and events; forming pseudo movement groups run by government agents; intimidating parents, employers, landlords etc.

3: Harassment through the legal system: Conspicuous surveillance; "investigative" interviews; grand jury subpoenas; discriminatory enforcement of tax laws and other government regulations; prefabricated evidence; perjured testimony; false arrest; wrongful imprisonment and more were used to intimidate activists and silence their supporters.

4: Extralegal force and violence: Threats; break-ins; vandalism; assault; beatings and political assassinations.

Guidelines for coping with infiltration:

1: Be careful to avoid pushing a new or hesitant member, or one facing personal, financial or legal problems, to take risks beyond what that person is ready to handle, particularly in situations which could result in arrest and prosecution. People in positions of legal or other jeopardy have proven especially vulnerable.

2: Deal openly with the form and content of what anyone says and does whether the person is a suspected agent, has emotional problems or is simply a sincere but naive or confused person new to the work.

3: Establish a process through which anyone who suspects an infiltrator (or other intervention) can express his/her fears without scaring others. Experienced people assigned this responsibility can do a great deal to help a group maintain its morale and focus while, at the same time, consolidating information and deciding how to use it. This plan works best when accompanied by group discussion of the danger of paranoia, so that everyone understands the reason for following the established procedure.

4: Take steps to alert other activists anytime an agent or informer admits their role or you have a concrete and verified basis for certain knowledge (make sure you have not been taken in by a snitch jacket). Act immediately and use every available means, including photographs, aliases, identifying traits, and a description of their methods of operation. In the 1960s, some agents managed, even after their exposure in one community, to move on and repeat their performance in others.

5: Be very cautious in attempting to expose a suspected, but unadmitted, agent or informer. The best approach depends on the nature of your group. A close-knit, self-selected group of experienced activists, especially one that contemplates illegal activities, should exclude anyone who is not fully trusted by everyone involved. If the stakes are high, don't be afraid to trust your intuition.

An open, public organisation trying to reach out and involve new people faces a very different situation. Here, an attempted exposure carries enormous risk. The suspects may claim to be the victims of discrimination and may falsely accuse his/her accusers as agents. In the process, activists may be turned against one another and lose the mutual trust and respect which is vital to any successful organisation or operation. New members and potential recruits may be scared away. The group's attention and energy may be so diverted that it is no longer able to move effectively towards its main goals.

Activists who suspect infiltration of a public political organisation should carefully evaluate alternatives to attempted exposure. The appropriate response depends on the kind of agent or informer you think you are dealing with.

A suspect who seems to play a passive, or even a constructive role may secretly be undermining the groups work or passing information to the FBI (or equivalent) and police. In this situation, it often is most productive to discreetly limit the suspect's opportunities without making your suspicions public. Take steps to deny access to organisational funds, financial records, mailing lists, office equipment, planning and security committees, discussions of illegal activity and meetings that plan criminal defence strategy. Go public if you later catch the person in the act (but not merely with incriminating evidence which could have been planted or forged).

A different approach is required if the suspect is an active disrupter or provocateur. In this case, it is most constructive to confront the form and content of what the suspect says and does, without making an issue of why she/he does it. Start with a discreet private talk, since the suspect could be merely naive or misguided. If the harmful behaviour persists you will probably have to take it on in an open group discussion. Plan in advance how to limit to risk of destruction and demoralisation. If you need to exclude or expel the suspect, be sure to inform other activists of your decisions and reasons.

A checklist of essential precautions:

1: Check out the authenticity of any letter, rumour, phone call or other communication before acting on it. Ask the supposed source if he/she is responsible.

2: Keep records of incidents that appear to reflect Cointelpro-type activity. Evaluate your response and report your experience to groups that document repression and resistance around the country.

3: Deal openly and honestly with differences within your movement (race, gender, class, age, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, personality, experience, physical and intellectual capacities etc) before the police/secret state can exploit them.

4: Don't try to expose a suspected agent or informer without solid proof. Purges based on mere suspicion only help the police/secret state to create distrust and paranoia. It generally works better to criticise what a disruptive person says and does, without speculating as to why.

5: Support all movement activists who come under attack. Don't be put off by political slander, such as recent attempts to smear some militant opponents of government policy as 'terrorists'. Organise public opposition to all witch-hunts, political trials and other forms of government and right wing harassment.

6: Cultivate relationships with sympathetic journalists who seem willing to investigate and publicise domestic covert operations. Let them know when you are harassed. Since the secret state thrives on secrecy, public exposure can undermine their ability to subvert our work.

7: Don't try to tough it out alone. Don't let others fret and suffer by themselves. Make sure that activists who are under stress get the help they need (someone to talk with, rest, therapy, etc). It is crucial that we build support networks and take care of one another.

8: Above all, do not let our movements be diverted from their main goals. Our most powerful weapon against political repression is effective organising around the issues and needs which directly affect peoples' lives.

Ban McDonalds' TV Ads!

DO YOU WANT TO HELP STOP MCDONALDS ADVERTISING
EXPLOITING CHILDREN? THEN
PLEASE SEND THIS COMPLAINT (OR DO YOUR OWN) TO THE INDEPENDENT TELEVISION COMMISSION....

Dear Friends,

We are supporting a campaign to get all McDonald's children's ads banned by the Independent Television Commission. This is on the grounds that the High Court has ruled that McDonald's advertising 'exploits children'. [There were also other relevant findings, including that their food has been deceptively promoted as 'nutritious' when in fact it is high in fat and salt and therefore linked to heart disease]. This means that their adverts contravene the Guidelines that are supposed to regulate advertising in order to protect children. It is all explained comprehensively in the letter below, which has been checked by an appropriate expert. An injunction is being prepared to force the ITC to take action on this issue. The following standard letter has been written for people to add their name to and send to the ITC.

Please copy and circulate the letter widely...

Best wishes,

Dave Morris,

From: [Your name and address]
Date:

Dear Stephen Locke [Director],

Re: McDonalds Advertising

I wish to make a serious complaint about the current advertising of McDonalds Restaurants Ltd aimed at or viewed by children. Please find below my reasons.

Under the ITC Code, all advertisements must 'comply in every respect with the law', and 'be applied in the spirit as well as the letter'.

Appendix 1, Rule 5: 'Advertisements must not exhort children to purchase or to ask their parents or others to make enquiries or purchases.'

In the recent 'McLibel' trial [McDonalds Corporation & Anr vs Steel & Morris], trial judge Mr Justice Bell ruled that it is a fact that McDonald's 'exploit children by using them, as more susceptible subjects of advertising, to pressurise their parents into going to McDonalds' (June 1997).

McDonalds have accepted (in a written submission to the Court of Appeal, 5.1.99) that the judge 'was correct in his conclusions'. That is to say, they accept that they exploit children through their advertising - in direct contravention of the ITC's published guidelines governing advertising to children. In fact, their strategy of systematic exploitation of pester-power is obviously far more serious than if they were to make a specific reference to this in a single advert (which is prohibited). Every parent of a young child, who has been subjected to this cumulative pester-power effect, knows this very real and infuriating pressure to go to McDonalds.

The Corporation spends 2 billion dollars each year worldwide on marketing and advertising. In a recent interview Mike Love, McDonalds' Vice-President of Communications stated that McDonalds would not consider changing its advertising strategy because of the judgement of Mr. Justice Bell, showing an absolute disregard for what the Courts judge to be true. This demonstrates that McDonalds will continue to exploit children for the foreseeable future, unless they are stopped by the ITC.

There can be no doubt about your power and responsibility in this matter. On July 3rd 1997, when asked about the McLibel judgement, Junior Government Minister Mark Fischer [for the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, also responsible for the ITC] stated: 'The Government recognise their special responsibility to protect children from exploitation, but the existing Code allows the ITC scope to act in their defence.'

McDonalds produce Happy Meals for children which are advertised as such. However, their Happy Meal Premiums (free toys) do not always come in premiums of 4. Their 101 Dalmatian Disney collection came in a set of 101 distinctly different toys. That set was produced in sealed white plastic wrappers. That resulted in children not knowing which of the 101 entirely different toys they were to receive. McDonalds have also produced the 'Beanie Babies' premiums in a set of 30. These premiums run for 4 weeks, backed up by advertisements directed at children.

Children naturally wish to collect anything collectable. However, to produce a large number over a four-week period, with the character of the toy unknown at the point of sale creates unnecessary competitiveness amongst children to be the first to collect the entire set, or to collect the entire set at all. This amplifies the 'pester-power' problem in contravention to Rule 5. The above is born out by the very fact that some of the sales of McDonalds Happy Meal premiums had to have sales restrictions placed upon them, as so many adults and children alike tried to buy as many as they could and the stores could not meet the demand.

Guidance Rule 10.36 states: 'Advertisements must not encourage or condone excessive consumption of any food.' - The increase in meals per week needed to buy a substantial number of the premiums per four weekly cycle will lead to an increase in consumption of food low in fibre, and high in fat and salt. This will lead to a detrimental, long-term affect on a child's physical health, also in contravention with Rule 1 (below).

Appendix 1, Rule 1 states: 'At times when large numbers of children are likely to be viewing, no product or service may be advertised and no method of advertising may be used which might result in harm to them physically, mentally, or morally, and no method of advertisement may be employed which takes advantage of the natural credulity and sense of loyalty of children.'

But the McDonalds Corporation's secret 'Operations Manual', the instruction book for every local store manager, explains the company's strategy for targeting young children: 'Ronald loves McDonald's and McDonald's food. And so do children, because they love Ronald. Remember, children exert a phenomenal influence when it comes to restaurant selection. This means you should do everything you can to appeal to children's love for Ronald and McDonalds'. It adds that offering toys is 'one of the best things...to make them loyal supporters'.

In the witness box during the McLibel trial David Green, the Corporation's Head of Marketing, from Chicago, recognised that McDonalds 'could change people's eating habits', and said that children were 'virgin ground as far as marketing is concerned'. Their

UK Marketing Services Manager Alistair Fairgreave stated: 'It is our [general] objective to dominate the communications arena...because we are competing for a share of the customer's mind.'

The Court of Appeal, in the appeal by the defendants in the McLibel case, concluded: 'If one eats enough McDonalds food, one's diet may well become high in fat, etc., with the very real risk of heart disease... (this last finding) must have a serious effect on their trading reputation since it goes to the very business in which they are engaged.' (March 1999) In the original trial the judge had ruled that such a risk of heart disease would be made the more likely for people who ate at McDonalds often and over a long period of time 'encouraged by [McDonalds'] advertising'. He further ruled that McDonalds deceptively portray their food, in reality high in fat and salt and low in fibre, as 'nutritious'. These three rulings, taken together, and compounded with the targeting and exploitation of children (who are the most vulnerable to the manipulation of long-term dietary patterns) surely demonstrate a conscious and systematic breach of the spirit and the letter of the ITC Guidelines. McDonalds view children as their future customers, and so wish to introduce them into a life of eating this kind of unhealthy food regularly from an early age. This is detrimental to their health in a serious way.

For the above reasons I urge the ITC to cease all McDonalds advertisements that are directed at children. I then urge the ITC to review all guidelines regarding advertisements to children - to ensure effective protection against exploitation and pester-power, and to include the banning of advertising of unhealthy food products. There is a great deal of concern over these issues, shared by many child welfare, consumer and health organisations* - and the need for a review has been very carefully outlined to you on their behalf in the past by the National Food Alliance [now known as Sustain] Working Party on Advertising. It should be noted that in Australia no advertising is allowed during pre-school programming, and in Sweden all advertising to children is banned.

I look forward to reading a considered opinion within the next 28 days.

Yours faithfully

One More Step

by Viva!'s Kate Fowler

When asked, most people will say that they turned vegetarian because they could not accept the way in which animals are treated. Whether it was seeing first hand the slaughter of farm animals or whether it was a slow dawning of the horrors involved in the meat industry, animals are generally the underlying catalysts for the change to a meat-free diet. As vegetarians we get to feel pretty proud of ourselves - not only are we saving thousands of lives by our stand, but we are fully aware that vegetarianism is better for the environment and the world's poor - not to mention our own health and well-being. We have every reason to feel pretty damn proud of ourselves and if a touch of smugness creeps in as well, then who could blame us?

But is vegetarianism the end of the right-on road? Is that where we draw the line and say: "I have done all I can possibly do to ensure no animal suffers on my behalf?" or should we take off those comfortable blinkers and look again at what made us go vegetarian in the first place?

Farm animals suffer. We know that slaughter is horrific and is carried out with maximum profit in mind and with little thought for the terror and pain of the creatures involved. It may sound obvious but even free-range hens and dairy cows are slaughtered in the same way as broiler hens and beef cows when their time is up. The meat goes to make low grade products like pies, stock cubes and even baby food. By continuing to buy the milk or eggs, the well-meaning vegetarian is financially supporting the meat industry and the chicken who laid your tasty free-range egg yesterday may well be on the conveyor belt towards the scalding tank today.

But it isn't just about slaughter. The lives of free range hens and dairy cows are not so rosy as they are made out to be. At a Sussex sanctuary, the most battered, feather-less and scrawny looking chickens to arrive were not from the battery units, they were free-range. Free-range laying stock is bred in the same way as battery hens. Incubated without a mother, these tiny birds will be sexed on the day they hatch and any males will be gassed or crushed to death. The females will live for two years, often in terrible conditions.

By definition, 'free-range' hens need only have access to the outside and this is often taken literally by the farmers who still keep their birds crammed into a shed but have a few openings into a barren yard. Because chickens are territorial, the stronger birds whose territory lies just before the opening will defend that area and the weaker birds may never see the light of day. Diseases are rife amidst these over-crowded conditions and antibiotics are fed to the birds in an attempt to reduce the deaths. The majority of free-range birds are de-beaked because these stresses lead to aggression and fighting. It is now well documented that the beak is not a piece of dead tissue but a highly sensitive organ. Free-range birds, as well as those from battery units, can die from the shock or the pain of having the end of their beak sliced off with a red-hot blade.

At the end of their useful lives, the same 'catchers' as are used to clear out battery units will come in and grab these birds by wing, leg or neck and shove them into crates to be transported to the slaughterhouse. 14% of free-range birds have broken bones before slaughter. The only way to ensure your eggs are cruelty-free is to either keep your own chickens or to visit the farm, or better still sanctuary, for yourself and see the conditions the birds live in. If you are refused entry, it is a fairly safe bet that they have something to hide.

But what about dairy cows? You see them in a field quietly munching the grass and looking pretty contented with life, so what could be wrong with taking some of their milk? Well, nothing is as simple as that. Cows do not just produce milk on demand whenever a milkmaid pushes a pail underneath her. She must be impregnated first and this results in the birth of a calf. "Obviously!" you may say, but then what happens to this calf - the calf that the milk is intended for? After just a couple of days mother and offspring are separated - an act that is heart-breaking for them both. Anyone who has ever heard a cow bellow for her new-born calf will never, never forget that sound. Before she has finished grieving for her lost calf she will be impregnated again. But the calf is merely the by-product of the milk industry. If female, she will be thrown into the miserable cycle of the dairy herd, if male he may be used for beef, sent to market or shot and disposed of as a waste product. A dairy cow would naturally live to the age of 20 and beyond but with the constant cycle of impregnation, lactating and giving birth, she will instead be killed at 5 years of age.

But the misery doesn't end there. Milk is money and when more of the former is produced, more of the latter swells the farmer's bank balance. As expected, when financial gain rears its ugly head, welfare and ethics head for the hills. Dairy cows currently produce ten times more milk than their calves could drink and this is achieved by dietary control, genetic manipulation and antibiotics. In the US, Bovine somatotropin (BST) is legally used to raise milk yield by 20% even though it has many side effects, including clinical mastitis, digestive disorders and lameness. It is currently banned in the UK. If you see that happy-looking cow out in the field, take a closer look. Her udders are painfully swollen with the weight of the milk and she may be infected with mastitis as a result. Forcing antibiotics up her teats does not control this disease but adds one more painful process she must endure.

The immense weight of her udders also leads to diseases of the legs and feet, particularly laminitis. To understand how this feels, it has been said that you should slam all your fingers in a door and then try to stand on your fingertips. Almost every cow at some time in her life will suffer from this crippling disease. And those beautifully gentle creatures suffer all this just so we can enjoy milk on our cereal in the morning.

These animals suffer but so does the environment. Slurry run-off pollutes our waterways and leads to acid rain, which destroys forests and woodlands world-wide. The methane produced by our dairy herds destroys the ozone layer. Air, land and waterways are all being poisoned by our love of dairy as much as by the meat-eaters' love of flesh. And we are being poisoned too. Dairy products are the main dietary source of the highly toxic organochlorine pesticides. Most outbreaks of E. coli, salmonella and listeria have been linked with consumption of meat, milk or cheese. In fact, reported cases of food poisoning in the UK are on the increase, 95% of which are meat and dairy related. 90 per cent of BSE cases have been in dairy cows rather than in beef cattle although the latter are generally slaughtered before infection can be diagnosed. Traces of BSE have been found in milk, probably via the infection of mastitis. And of course dairy products are full of saturated fat, the consumption of which is linked to a whole range of diseases, particularly heart disease and cancer. Cholesterol is also found in dairy produce and if taken in excess furs up the arteries - leading to high blood pressure, gall stones, heart attacks and strokes.

So is it time to take another look at ourselves and see that what we do, although well-meaning and very positive, may not be enough? No one would condemn the vegetarian for the efforts they have made to reduce suffering but if we are serious about ending the suffering of animals, protecting the environment and looking after our own health, then maybe we should re-examine the food that we eat. Perhaps it is time to go the whole hog, if you'll excuse a very inappropriate phrase, and end the egg consumption, ditch the dairy and launch wholeheartedly into the totally tasty, cruelty-free and justifiably smug world of veganism.

THE VIOLENCE OF EATING MEAT

by Gail

When shots rang out in Littleton, Colorado, political activists and leaders sprang forward to spew their theories on why violence had entered our schools. "Too many guns!" they cried, "We need more gun control legislation." "Too much violence in movies, music, video games, and on TV. We must restrict the entertainment industry!" Still others blame the separation of church and state. They actually want us to believe that the reason so many kids commit acts of violence is because we don't have the Ten Commandments plastered all over our nation's classrooms. What does that say about the estimated 20% of Americans who are atheists or the tens of millions of agnostics, Buddhists, Taoists, Hindus and other free thinkers? Are they all violent criminals?

To blame the firearms or entertainment industry alone for the increase of violence among our nation's youth is a tragic oversimplification of the problem. I think the more basic question is: "Why do our children seem to have so little regard for life?" What good is a sign that reads "Thou shalt not kill" when school cafeterias are serving murder for lunch?

In the United States alone, we kill 9 billion animals each year to satisfy our fantastical palates. That's an astounding 1 million animals per hour. To assume that these animals do not suffer during the process of raising, transporting, and slaughtering is to delude ourselves so that we can feel comfortable eating their flesh.

Author/Journalist Jim Mason wrote, "Americans have a tremendous appetite for meat, dairy products, and eggs. They have little appetite, however, for information about the lives of animals that produce what they eat. Perhaps they sense something." More than one person has said to me, "Don't tell me where my lunch came from. I'll lose my appetite." Well, that's the point. You should lose your appetite!

In recent years, we have witnessed 10 year-olds killing 4 year-olds and teens methodically planning and executing mass murder. How did the innocence of childhood get lost? Certainly, the children who committed these acts were deeply troubled, and there is no simple explanation for their behaviour. However, we continue to focus on the surface while failing to recognise the doses of terror and fear fed to these children at each and every meal.

From the earliest age, we inadvertently teach our children to disregard the sanctity of life. When we place a piece of meat on a child's plate and expect him to easily overcome his natural repulsion towards eating a once living, feeling, being we are sending the message that it's okay to kill to fulfil our needs or desires. We are asking children to ignore their own feelings of empathy, humaneness, and compassion. Yet, these are precisely the feelings which when cultivated, prevent childish impulses from becoming acts of violence.

Most small children are horrified to learn that their hamburger once was a cute little barnyard animal. But with repeated reassurance from parents and a bombardment of highly effective advertising targeted at kids, they become culturalised into the mainstream of our eating habits; desensitised, unwitting participants in the cycle of cruelty and killing.

Feed these same kids foods loaded with refined sugar, food colourings, preservatives, and chemical additives like aspartame and the delicate balance of their physiology is thrown into chaos as well.

The animals that will become the next "Happy Meal" know when they are going to die. They smell the blood and hear the cries of their brethren slaughtered before them as they are marched onto the killing floor. Imagine the terror these animals experience the moment they are killed. Hormones course through their veins and remain in their flesh after death. Eat a piece of meat and you are eating the physical manifestation of fear. Still worse, you are feeding it to your children.

To begin to unravel the complex issues surrounding the spread of violence among kids, we need to examine the subtleties of the messages we send to them. Not just in the media, but more significantly, in our homes. Children who are taught that all life is precious, and are made to feel precious and priceless themselves do not feel compelled to commit acts of violence.

Bats - The Facts

Did you know that there are 16 bat species living in Britain? Tragically, the mouse-eared bat was declared extinct from Britain in 1991. Of the 16 left, 2 are endangered and 9 others are threatened. Bats have suffered from human ignorance and misunderstanding together with loss of feeding habitat and roost sites. Law in Britain protects bats and their roosts, but this on its own is not enough to safeguard their future.

Some facts about Bats:

- Bats are the only flying mammals.
- Britain's commonest bat, the Pipistrelle, is only 4cm long and weighs about 5g - less than a 2p coin.
- Bats are not blind. They can also 'see' in the dark by listening to the echoes of their high frequency calls. With this sophisticated sonar system called 'echolocation', they can pick up insects as tiny as mosquitoes.
- In Britain it is illegal to disturb bats or the places where they roost.
- Bats can live up to 30 years.
- Of about 4,500 different species of mammal in the world, nearly 1,000 are bats.
- Three quarters of these eat insects just as British bats do. In the tropics bats also eat many other foods - fruit, flowers, frogs, fish, blood, even bats!
- Bats are vital to rainforests, as many trees need bats for pollination and seed dispersal.
- Bats rarely live in belfries, they prefer somewhere quiet, not draughty, and cobweb-free!
- Bat populations are threatened not only by loss of habitat, affecting roosting sites and feeding grounds, but also by deliberate killing and over exploitation for food.

Living Without Cruelty 2000

Animal Aid, the national animal pressure group, will be holding a Living Without Cruelty exhibition at:

Kensington Town Hall,
Hornton Street, London W8
(Nr. Kensington High Street underground station) on the 17th - 19th March 2000.

Entrance costs:
£3.50 waged (£2.50 unwaged);
£10 family ticket (2 adult and 2 children).

The event will both confront and point to solutions to the vital issues facing humanity - from genetic modification to globalisation; from pollution to animal protection; from human hunger to Third World debt and fair trade.

In addition to the 50-plus stands booked by pressure groups and ethical companies, there will be displays, games, lectures and film shows. The exhibition will also feature themed exhibits:

- The Millennium Maze will take visitors through the tangle of modern ethical dilemmas and invite them to sign the life-affirming Millennium Pledge.

- Medicine in the Twenty-First Century will allow visitors to explore some of the possibilities for replacing animal experiments with more reliable and compassionate methods.

ITEMS of INTEREST

Compiled by Martin Masterman Lister

A new form of European super-protection is on the way for some of Britain's loveliest and wildest landscapes, often because of the tiny examples of wildlife they contain. Windsor Great Park and Windsor Forest, the Royal family's backyard will be safeguarded because of the violet tick beetle. The New Forest will be protected because of the stag beetle. These and other sites will be protected under the European Union's Habitats Directive, a law with real bite, which offers the areas near absolute protection, making them safer than even the National Parks. In the past, environmental safeguards have been easily overturned. Twyford Down, near Winchester, was an unspoilt hillside in 1992, was bisected by the M3 in spite of five separate designations - it was doubly a Site of Special Scientific Interest (SSSI), doubly a Scheduled Ancient Monument (SAM) and part of an Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONB). But the new Habitats Directive's Special Area of Conservation, is about to make a repeat of Twyford Down very much less likely. There are 340 SAC within the UK, totalling nearly 1.7 million hectares, an area three times the size of Norfolk. They range from small ponds to vast areas of 100,000 acres such as Dartmoor, and will not consider the needs for tourism, recreation, or anything else, and will cover everyone including the Duke of Edinburgh, Warden of Windsor Great Park. In 1995 the Duke had 63 of the park's ancient oak trees cut down to improve the look of the landscape. Independent 21-6-99

Myxomatosis is killing rabbits again this autumn. Originally from South America, it was deliberately introduced in 1954 and wiped out 99 per cent of the 100 million rabbits in Britain. Since then, some rabbits have developed immunity. Transmitted by fleas, the symptoms are distressing: the rabbits, eyes fill with puss, swell up until they cannot see, they cannot find their burrows and, although they can eat, they eventually starve. Predators that normally live on rabbits, foxes, stoats, and buzzards - switch to other prey such as voles until the population builds up again. Independent 4-9-99

Senior Government scientists will call for tough new curbs on antibiotics fed to chickens and pigs after research showed they pose a bigger risk to human health than BSE, and a real threat of resistant bacteria being transferred from animals to humans. The Advisory Committee on Microbial Safety of Food (ACMSF) will warn that diseases such as salmonella and E.coli will develop previously unseen levels of resistance. The Soil Association claims Britain is facing a major epidemic of diseases that have developed multiple resistance, and intensively raised chickens and many pigs are now being fed a potentially dangerous growth promoter, over-prescribed by vets. Some strains of salmonella now have a 95 per cent resistance to antibiotics, compared with 5 per cent 20 years ago, while the resistance of MRSA has risen from 2 per cent to 40 per cent since 1989. The EU banned four drugs in July, but the British Government has allowed farmers to feed chickens with a similar antibiotic, avilamycin, which critics

Thousands of British consumers were exposed to an experimental cancer-causing chemical, made by Monsanto, during the late 1980s after the Tory Government gave permission for its use on 38 farms in a clandestine experiment lasting three years in southern England. It now emerges that hundreds of animals were injected with Monsanto's genetically modified hormone known as BST, designed to increase milk yields by 10 to 15 per cent. The milk and some dairy products were sold to the public without any warning. This year the EU's scientific committee concluded that the hormone increased the risk of breast and prostate cancer, and also feared that it could lead to cancer of the colon. In 1985 Monsanto and another US company Eli Lilly were given licences by the Government to test BST. The hormone was banned in the EU in 1990 after being linked with udder infections and reproductive problems. Earlier this year Canada also banned the chemical. Monsanto claimed BST milk did not have increased levels of IGF, a hormone linked to some cancers'. But EU scientists have now demonstrated that BST contains up to five times more IGF than normal milk and Monsanto wrongly claimed that the hormone would be broken down before it reached the gut. Four of Britain's most senior scientists down-played the potential risk of the transmission of BSE to humans through vaccines, but insisted the serious warnings they gave to medical experts to make vaccines from non-BSE-infected cattle were not fully acted upon. The BSE working group set up in 1989, led by Sir Richard Southwood, published a report which changed a "relatively high" risk to a "remote" risk. Experts are now examining whether the BSE epidemic could have been caused by scientists trying to create a new breed of super cattle by injecting hormones from the brains of slaughtered carcasses into healthy animals. Experts are examining whether the pituitary gland could have spread mad cow disease and infected humans. The agent could have been used in thousands of measles, rubella and tetanus injections. Salmon that grow four times as fast as nature intended, pigs with oversize hams and cows with giant udders are all part of the nightmare scenario where animal welfare comes second to food production. The animals developed a number of deformities, suffered severe arthritis and suffered great distress. Another research project disaster brought us pregnant cows with oversized foetuses. For the fish, environmental concerns brought about its abandonment, rather than animal welfare concerns. John Webb, a geneticist at the Cotswold Pig Breeding Company, said that altering genes could lead to benefits to animals and farmers. Pigs have already been selectively bred. Independent 30-7-99

Special Millennium Wish

I have a wish for the millennium, it's a very simple one.

I wish that all the animals will be free to skip and run.

Animals should not be used for fur and should not be used for meat,

Think of all the lovely fruit and veggies you could eat.

Animals should not be used for tricks and should not be used for fun.

So let my millennium wish come true, I'm sure it could be done.

Agriculture Minister Jeff Rooker is facing mounting pressure to disclose full details of secret experiments which exposed consumers to potentially lethal hormones in milk, following the Observer's revelation that nearly 40 farms had been involved in trials of a hormone to increase milk yields. The government has been forced to write to Monsanto seeking its permission to release the details. The tests, in the 1980s involved cattle being injected with a hormone to increase milk yields, but instead of discarding it, the milk went into the general milk supply without the public being informed. The EU scientific committee has concluded that hormones found in BST milk increase the risk of breast, prostate and colonic cancer. Since the 1997 election, the Labour government has refused to reveal the location or timings of the trials. Biotechnology firms Lilly Industries and Cyanamid were also given animal test certificates to conduct the secret trials, which took place on 39 farms. Despite the secrecy, The Observer can reveal that one of the country's most influential dairy farmers took part in the experiment. Michael Lambert, who is now chair of the NFU's milk committee, injected cows on his Somerset farms with BST and allowed this milk to be passed on to the public. The NFU was then in favour of using BST, but changed its mind in the mid 1990s when the EU placed a moratorium on BST. The ban is due to end this year and could spark a trade war with the US which is demanding Monsanto's genetically engineered beef hormones be made available in Europe. Lambert is now vigorously opposed to the use of BST, having seen the effect in cattle, saying he saw severe swellings where the cows were injected, and they were clearly in discomfort. The Observer has also discovered that Grove Farm in Wendover, Buckinghamshire, took part in the secret trials. Observer 27-6-99

Beware! - Built in Cameras!

Spy cameras are to be hidden in ordinary police helmets so they can film people on the streets. The equipment, which will be faithful to the traditional police helmet in its shape, is being developed as the latest weapon in the surveillance-led fight against crime and 'subversion'. The idea for the new helmet came after the redesign of riot helmets equipped with radio and a secret camera, which can relay live images to a base unit or record proceedings as they happen. The Metropolitan Police are one of the forces who have expressed interest in the new helmets. Mounted police officers in Cleveland have used the equipment at football matches and successfully used the taped evidence in prosecutions. Chief Superintendent Stephen French, of the Met's Public Order Branch, has said, "Intelligence-driven policing is the way forward and anything to be done to facilitate that should be welcomed."

In Britain there are 5,500 people waiting for an organ transplant and 2,500 transplants were carried out last year. The US investment bank Solomon Brothers estimates that worldwide there were 45,000 transplants in 1994, but that with an unlimited supply of pig organs, this would rise to 455,000 by 2010 with a value of $6bn a year. In 1995, Imutran transplanted a pig heart into a monkey which lived for 60 days. Then disaster struck. The Government set up the Kennedy inquiry into xenotransplantation, under Professor Ian Kennedy, professor of medical law and ethics, because of concerns about animal viruses and ethics. The Kennedy report concluded it was ethical only if the risks to patient and the population were reduced to "tolerable levels", and the pigs were looked after, and the costs were acceptable. The chief fears were viruses transferring to the human population in the same way that it is believed AIDS spread from monkeys. BSE had shocked scientists by spreading from sheep to cattle and then to humans. Research had identified four pig retroviruses and studies had shown two could potentially pass to humans. He has met John Major, Chris Patten, Neil Kinnock and Paddy Ashdown. In 1996 he personally handed £1m to the Labour Party. His life was changed in the early Sixties when he witnessed the savagery of the Canadian seal hunt, where hunters clubbed to death Harp seals for their fur, concentrating on the young pups, whose coats for the first three weeks of their lives are pure white. Fishermen have been accused of mutilating dolphins after a number of headless bodies were washed up on the beaches of Southwest Britain. Trawler crews are believed to have decapitated the dolphins after the creatures became entangled in their nets. Worried about rising adverse public publicity from dolphins dying in nets, fishermen are cutting them to pieces in the hope they will sink rather than be washed ashore. But the tactics have backfired, with three being washed ashore, one with its tail sliced off. The discovery follows six decapitations off Cornwall last year. Fishermen consider the catching of dolphins an unavoidable industrial hazard, as replacing broken nets is time-consuming and expensive. However one dolphin which was washed up had slices of flesh removed, suggesting it was fishermen making dolphin steaks. The decapitations have highlighted the devastation wreaked on dolphin numbers by industrial trawling. Dolphin strandings, where dead animals are washed up on shore, are on the rise in the south-west. In Cornwall, 28 dolphins and whales

Animal Rites - Liturgies of Animal Care - by Andrew Linzey

Christians believe that the Logos is the source of all life, yet Christian worship remains unashamedly humanocentric. The world of creation, and animals in particular, is almost invisible in our worship. The churches currently do not have the liturgical means of celebrating the life of animals, giving thanks for their companionship, praying for the relief of their suffering.

This new book provides ten new liturgies which are animal-friendly and animal-inclusive. They include services of celebration for animal companionship, services for animal welfare, healing liturgies, new eucharistic prayers 'for the whole creation', and animal burial services. Underlying all these new forms is a serious theological purpose: to help us to draw deeper into the mystery of God's work in creation and to affirm other sentient beings as co-creatures with us.

Andrew Linzey writes: "Already hundreds of parishes hold animal blessing services every year. These provide an opportunity for celebration, care, and preaching on the theme of Christian responsibility for creation".

Andrew Linzey holds the world's first post in theology and animal welfare - the IFAW Senior Research Fellowship at Mansfield College, Oxford.

have been washed up on the county's beaches this year, compared with 65 for the whole of 1998 and 52 in 1997, according to the Cornwall Wildlife Trust. In Devon, around 30 were washed up last year. The vast majority of stranded dolphins, around 80 per cent, die after being caught up in fishing nets. Others die of pollution or accidental beachings. Most dolphins and their smaller cousins the porpoises, are caught in large industrial trawlers which have already scooped up over 1.5m mackerel and sea bass off the south-west coast this year, using nets up to a mile wide. Entangled in a net, a dolphin or a porpoise will shut its blow-hole and suffocate. The Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society says the porpoise is almost extinct in southern British waters. Lead shot is to be banned from the shotgun cartridges of Britain's wildfowlers, the Government announced today. When shooting ducks and geese over the seashore, estuaries, lakes and other wetlands, wildfowlers will have to use shotgun pellets of a different, non-toxic material, or risk a fine of up to £5,000. The ban is intended to end the lead poisoning of water birds, which ingest spent shot when taking in grit to aid digestion, and subsequently suffer a lingering and painful death. The action follows the successful ban on lead weights in angling in 1987, which has allowed mute swan populations to expand greatly. The ban should be in place in England in time for the new wildfowling season on 1 September. The timing of the ban in Scotland and Wales will depend on the new Scottish and Welsh assemblies. A similar ban is to be introduced in Northern Ireland. A typical 12-bore shotgun cartridge contains about 250 pellets of lead, weighing about 35g, and it is thought that about 2,000 tons of shot are used by wildfowlers in Europe each season, much of which falls into wetland habitats. Birds suffering from lead poisoning tend to seek cover and die isolated deaths, so there are no figures for how many are lost each year, but it has been estimated that 2 to 3 per cent of the United States' autumn wildfowl population (1.6 to 2.4 million birds) dies each year from lead shot ingestion, and according to the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust, levels of ingestion of lead in northern Europe are similar. The ban will affect the 16,000 members of wildfowling clubs and up to 100,000 other shooters. The British Association for Shooting and Conservation said it accepted the ban. Independent 8-4-99

An attempt to outlaw fur farming was blocked by Tory backbenchers yesterday. The Fur Farming (Prohibition) Private Member's Bill, sponsored by Maria Eagle with cross-party support was halted by amendments drawn up by former Tory ministers Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) and David Maclean (Penrith and the Border) after a five hour debate. The Bill which aims to close England's remaining 13 mink farms by January 2002 and compensate farmers for their loss, now goes back down the queue and stands little chance of becoming law. The Bill proposed it be an offence to keep any animal for slaughter or for breeding where the sole or primary purpose is to obtain the value of their fur, punishable by a fine of up to £20,000. Up to 150,000 young mink are slaughtered on farms each year for their pelts. They are not domesticated, Foxes are far from being the voracious predators that they are made out to be and probably do less damage to native wildlife than red deer, zoologists have found. They have little impact on populations of wild birds, yet overgrazing by red deer in Scotland has scarred the landscape and made it more difficult for other wild animals to survive. Professor of environmental sciences, Stephen Harris, a leading expert on foxes, said that just eight out of 60 studies into the predation of groundnesting wading birds have shown that the fox has an impact on bird numbers, and even that was low. A study on lapwings showed that foxes were their least important predators; crows were much more important. As for pheasants, they have not adapted to the wild so it is not surprising that they are vulnerable. Rabbits form between 70 and 80 per cent of a fox's diet, with voles, worms and insects making up the rest. Red deer have a devastating impact on local wildlife, and have no natural predators, and eat young trees as soon as they appear. The solution would be to re-introduce wolves into the Highlands. "We can hardly expect other countries to keep dangerous animals such as tigers when we are unwilling to suffer much smaller problems, such as wolves. Red deer make life far more difficult for other animals; birds being more vulnerable to being found by predators such as the fox and eagles. There are currently about 250,000 adult foxes, producing 400,000 cubs a year, most of which die in their first year. Humans kill about 400,000 foxes a year, and a ban on fox-hunting, which kills 20,000 a year at most, would have little impact on fox control. Independent 18-9-99

Shops selling alternative medicines are up in arms against new government regulations, which, it is said, will sweep hundreds of herbal remedies and alternative medicines off the shelves. The EC is insistent; twice in September 1996 and again last year, it attacked Britain for failing to remove from the market products labelled as health foods, alternative remedies or even cosmetics which have an effect on the body. If a product is a medicine or claims to have medicinal effects, it must be put through clinical trials and get a licence from the Medicines Control Agency, which is unbelievably expensive. The official document, MLX249, proposes amendments to the Medicines for Human Use Regulations 1994, and the industry says it will give the MCA unacceptable powers to decide whether borderline products in the grey area between foods and medicines, cosmetics or medical devices, is a medicine or not. If the MCA decrees the presence of fluoride in some toothpastes makes them a medicine, then manufacturers will have to get a licence or stop selling them, or face prosecution. In the future, the MCA may be both prosecutor and judge. The MCA says it sees the rule change as a way of dealing with outrageous claims where they are made, for instance, bogus Aids cures. Animal rights extremists caused £1m damage in an arson attack on a Unigate dairy in Oxford, completely burning out seventeen vehicles. Half an hour earlier, four vehicles were destroyed at Tadmartin Poultry in nearby Banbury. The attackers left incendiary devices under each vehicle, and were said to have been well made. All but one device went off. Unigate Dairies spokeswoman Tony Hensby said the incident was inexplicable and they were at a complete loss. Earlier, Thames Valley Police arrested 20 people during a sit down protest at the Hillgrove Cat Farm in nearby Witney. One man was charged with obstructing police, 19 others were released pending inquiries. Independent 2-8-99

A duck-billed platypus has been born in captivity for the first time since 1944, and only the second time in history, at the Healesville Sanctuary in Melbourne. The platypus an egg-laying mammal or monotreme, is another of evolution's great survivors. It catches prawns using electro-receptors on its bill. Independent 10-4-99

Despite its size, about a foot long, and a 200-million year history dating back to the Jurassic Age, the mantis prawn has only just been discovered at the bottom of Sydney harbour. It can strike its fish prey in five milliseconds and has the most complex vision of any invertebrate. If it were the size of a shark, it would be the most fearsome creature in the sea. Criminal gangs who smuggle endangered species are to be the subject of a British-led drive to stamp out the trade. Police and prosecutors in impoverished countries in the Caribbean and the Commonwealth will receive specialised training in environmental and criminal law to capture the traffickers. The programme aims not only to tackle the smuggling of tigers, birds and parrots, but the illegal movement of environmentally damaging chemicals such as CFCS. Independent 6-4-99

Scores of animals are close to extinction because the cloud forests of Central America are being destroyed through climate change. Rising temperature is causing the moisture-laden mists to disappear; since 1987, 20 out of 50 species of frog and toad are believed to have perished, with one species endemic to Costa Rica, the golden toad, has not been seen for more than 10 years. The frequency of the mists occurring over the mountains over the past 20 years has declined, forming on higher slopes. Monteverde has become cloudier but drier. Estimates put the mists at 200 metres higher, enough to destroy the delicately balanced habitats of cloud-forest animals. Rising sea-surface temperatures are probably behind the change. Populations of birds and reptiles and lizards have disappeared too. Independent 26-4-99

The RSPCA has issued a warning over the latest craze, owning a chacoan monkey tree frog. The charity said there was a disturbing increase in the number of exotic animals kept as pets - an estimated one million now own pet reptiles. The monkey frog comes from northern Argentina and Paraguay, and its natural habitat is desert. It must be fed live insects, such as three or four crickets two or three times a week, and have its accommodation kept at 30C to 35C. Independent 12-4-99

With the closure of Consort Kennels and Hillgrove Farm, the strength of the animal liberation movement has been fully realised. We must build upon that strength, teach by example, use our resources to the best of our abilities, promote a vegan way of life and spread the vegan message far and wide.

The Animal Liberation / vegan movement must break down the barriers of prejudice, ignorance, bigotry, discrimination and hatred which keep animals caged, abused, exploited, used, insulted, made fun of, humiliated, tortured and finally, murdered. This movement must remain consistent in its fight to free animals from oppression by not embracing racism, sexism, homophobia or intolerance of religious beliefs as part of the struggle. The systematic abuse of animals relies on a fascistic doctrine of brutality and repressive policies. We congratulate London Animal Action for taking a stand against racists and sexists in the Animal Liberation movement and hope other groups will follow their lead...

The Government's most senior scientist, Sir Robert May, the Chief Scientific Advisor, has contradicted Tony Blair's policy on GM crops with a call for a four-year ban on their commercial release, not before 2003 at the earliest. Mr Blair and his ministers have repeatedly refused demands for a four-year ban from English Nature and other environmental groups. But in a letter to the RSPB, Sir Robert makes it clear he agrees with its view that no releases should occur until farm-scale trials are completed at the end of 2002. Independent 20-5-99

One of the world's richest jockey clubs is to shoot 200 racehorses because they are no longer winning money for their wealthy owners. The Hong Kong Jockey Club, with revenues last year of £7.3bn, is planning a cull of about a fifth of its stock, to be shot before July. Some 100 horses are put down each year in Hong Kong due to health problems. While the club does offer to make a payment towards the £3,000, its elite owners must pay to have their horses flown abroad. Many owners, as well as the club, are taking the cheaper option of shooting the retired animals, even though the club's five annual international races carry stake money of £2.5m, enough to ship more than 800 retired horses abroad.
